

Thank you for the email below and the opportunity for Voluntary Arts Wales (VAW) to respond to the WAG enquiry. It was an interesting session and we were grateful for the opportunity, however, as with all these occasions there is always more that we wished we had said and we would like to add a couple of points in this email for the Communities and Culture Committee to consider.

With regard to our last recommendation in our original response relating to the involvement of local authorities in funding distribution: we would prefer to withdraw this recommendation. It was drafted at a time of extreme frustration for the sector related to the Arts Council of Wales (ACW) decision to de-prioritise the voluntary sector and a wish to find an alternative methodology for the distribution of support for the sector. Withdrawing this recommendation makes your first question essentially redundant. However there is still a need to find a better way of funding arts organisations across Wales which takes into account their very specific local connections, expertise and value to their communities.

With reference to your question 2:

At the sectoral event 'A Piece of Your Mind' that we staged at the beginning of September 2010 (where third sector voluntary and community arts organisations were given the platform to air their concerns regarding the re-prioritisation of funding for the arts in Wales), the Black Voluntary Sector Network for Wales were present and this statement was a direct quote from their organisation's representative. Whilst we could justify their statement for them it would be far more appropriate for them to be contacted directly. Leanne Rahman was their delegate and she can be contacted as follows: Direct Line: 029 20440188, Email: l.rahman@bvsnw.org.uk

With reference to your question 3:

The ACW figures relating to access and participation refer solely to the activity figures supplied by their funded clients and in no way represent the wider activity of the sector. During our representation to the Communities and Culture Committee we drew your attention to some recent research undertaken in England by a department of the DCMS under the title: 'Our Creative Talent'. We have attached this document for your information (map 7402). This was a robust study which revealed the activities of 49,140 amateur arts groups across England with a figure of 5.9 million people actively participating in the arts.

As far as we are aware the ACW are not undertaking any research in to access and participation nor are they undertaking any research in to the impact of their Investment Review. Once the cuts are implemented many artform infrastructures will disappear and it may be too late and impossible to undertake any meaningful and comprehensive sectoral research in view of the knowledge and consultation mechanisms that could be lost. Removing funding for those infrastructure bodies that work with the voluntary and community sectors across Wales will effectively remove the facility to consult and communicate with the citizens involved in those sectors.

We are however, recommending that the ACW be requested to undertake a baseline mapping exercise by local authority area, of opportunities to actively take part in the arts in Wales and to assess the impact of the cuts that they are implementing. This should take place in consultation with the sector and in partnership with NALGAO Wales and the WLGA.

The Welsh Arts Council as was and the Arts Council of Wales as is, have taken fifteen years to develop a strategy for participation in the arts. VAW have been consulted during this long and protracted process. The disappointing resultant document has been drafted to deliver to the new priorities of the ACW and focuses largely on professionally led work designed to transform communities and does not reflect the activities, aspirations, needs or diversity of delivery and practice of the voluntary arts sector.

The ACW Voluntary Cultural Sector Compact was originally developed in close collaboration with VAW to ensure inclusion and representation from, and delivery to the voluntary arts sector. The current and third revision of this document has changed and been adjusted to reflect the voluntary sector in the widest possible terms in line with Welsh Assembly Government policy, thus skewing the parameters and shifting vastly away from the ethos and intentions of the original document. This means that practically all the ACW clients are essentially voluntary sector organisations, as they are mostly non-profit making organisations and registered charities; which places the Welsh National Opera under the same consideration as a voluntary organisation such as Mold Amateur Dramatic Society. However, in the Investment Review the casualties are generally those organisations truly embedded in the voluntary sector.

VAW is the Wales-based operation of Voluntary Arts (VA) which operates across the UK and the Republic of Ireland with funding from each of the national arts councils. As from the 1st April 2011 the revenue funding contribution from the ACW for the operation in Wales will cease, depriving the people of Wales of the free support and services that are provided to the voluntary sector in the rest of the UK and the Republic of Ireland. VAW recognises that the funding situation is such that cuts have to be implemented. However, the arbitrary way in which the ACW have selected to fund high profile events and organisations at the expense and loss of those quality organisations organically generated from the community and serving those communities from which they have developed is unacceptable.

In a season of plenty events such as The Venice Biennale and the Artes Mundi should be supported and celebrated however, VAW and the voluntary sector question the ACW prioritising these events in a time of austerity. Not detracting from the quality of these expensive high profile events, the impact per pound of the same monies delivered through participatory arts activity at grassroots level is immense. Compared to the funding of organisations which work directly with the community in Wales, spending in the region of £550,000 on an event that benefits one Wales-based artist is very hard to justify. For example if you take into account VAW, the Drama Association of Wales and Ty Cerdd; the cumulative membership of community groups and organisations that these umbrella structures support is just under 3000. When you realise that the cumulative revenue funding from the ACW for this supportive work is in the region of £350,000, you start to see how just 64% of the Venice Biennale budget can have such a reach to grass roots level in Wales.

How can the ACW justify funding the “top” of the pyramid whilst ignoring its foundations? It is well recognised that different parts of the arts sector intertwine and feed each other – the voluntary/community arts sector is often a breeding ground from which professional artists and arts organisations grow. See article in VAW newsletter “Outside the Box” attached (Spring 2010). The years to come will see rising difficulties in communities across Wales; it is well recognised and substantiated that participatory arts are the glue that keeps communities together, providing regenerational stimulus and focus. It is here, in these times that monies should be focused and Venice is for another day. See article in VAW newsletter “Recession Busting” attached (Spring 09). Whilst interpreting the intentions and implications of the UK Coalition „Big Society Programme” is currently engaging government departments and the WAG, VAW is concerned that any cultural benefits to the citizens of Wales will be reduced by the ACW moving its priorities towards a high arts agenda.

Further to the above, we wonder how the ACW can continue to deliver to the Culture minister’s priority in its remit letter, regarding “participation being available to all”, when it is removing funding and „deprioritising the amateur sector” where the majority of arts participation takes place..

Once again many thanks for the opportunity and the chance to represent our sector’s opinions.

Best wishes

1. Executive Summary

- Formally organised voluntary and amateur arts groups are a crucially important part of the arts ecology and account for almost one fifth of all arts participation in England, although in some regions it is much higher than that – rising to 36% in the South West.
- There are 49,140 groups across the country with a total of 5.9 million members. An additional 3.5 million people volunteer as extras or helpers – a total of 9.4 million people taking part.
- The sector has an income of £543m a year. In general, it is not looking for core public funding. Groups are entrepreneurial about generating income, including ticket income, subscriptions, selling programmes, local sponsorship and other fundraising. Groups take pride in this remarkable ability to be self-sustaining and deliver quality artistic product.
- In 2006/07 groups put on 710,000 performances or exhibitions which attracted 159 million attendances. On average a voluntary and amateur group attracts 220 people to each performance or exhibition.
- 564,000 people have management roles in voluntary arts groups. Planning and developing creative activity which is high quality, engaging and meets the needs of members is complex and challenging. The time, expertise and commitment these individuals invest in the sector is a real asset that, if not delivered for free, would come at a high price.
- The voluntary arts sector is embedded in the grass roots of local communities and has a complex impact on developing vibrant and inclusive communities. At a time when there is huge competition for time and money, voluntary and amateur groups rely heavily upon the expertise, experience and relationships of their members, their friends, families and the local community, highlighting the value placed on voluntary arts activity.
- Voluntary and amateur groups provide opportunities for people who would not otherwise participate in the arts to do so within their local community. Arts groups are often associated with other groups and activities (such as learning, religious groups, older people's groups and women's organisations) and are particularly well placed to engage new audiences and participants in the arts.
- There is support and advice available at regional and national level. Local Authority arts officers can play a crucial role in developing capacity but their engagement is often reactive and ad hoc. Although most Local Authorities have cultural and arts development strategies, voluntary arts are often ignored. This is to miss a significant opportunity. The introduction this year of local data collection on levels of arts engagement, which will enable comparisons to be made between Local Authorities for the first time, may be a powerful lever for change.
- Appreciation of the artform is the main motivation for participation in a group. There is a belief that the amateur arts are low quality, which is totally at odds with the ambitions of groups who strive for the highest standards and take pride in the quality of their work.
- The sector plays an important role in sustaining cultural traditions and developing new artistic practice. There are a large number of groups with a national and even international reputation for the quality of their work. Over the last five years, 34% of amateur groups have had members who went on to become professional.

- The relationship between the amateur and professional sectors is of vital importance and the two sectors are mutually supportive. Groups spend £125m employing professional artists, either on a long term or ad hoc basis. Professional artists benefit not only in terms of employment but also developing their creative practice, experiencing new ways of working and deepening their understanding of audience development.
- The amateur/professional relationship is changing, particularly with the development of new technology. It has not been possible to explore this in detail in this study, and we recommend further research should be done into this rewarding area.
- Access to good quality venues, at a reasonable cost that is suitable for the artform, is a key issue. Groups spend £67m on venue hire for performances and £26m on venues for rehearsals/meetings. There is widespread concern about the rising cost of venue hire.
- Other issues affecting the sector are the complexity of grant application processes, the need to raise profile and attract new members and advice and guidance on compliance with legislation.
- The sector has tremendous potential, but there are constraints on the extent to which any one group can expand. There are significant challenges involved in moving to a larger venue and taking on additional management burdens, and individual members can have less opportunity to contribute in larger groups. This might lead to people establishing new groups or sign-posting new members to other groups.
- There is a view that in some areas the professional sector has been unduly prioritised by policy makers, perhaps in part because of the belief that the voluntary sector is low quality. However, policy makers need to engage more effectively with the voluntary and amateur sector if they are not to miss a major opportunity to increase opportunities for participation in the arts.
- In the last three years there were 1.9 million adult enrolments in unaccredited training funded by the Learning and Skills Council. There are 36,800 classes across England offered by 4,560 providers. However, the number of enrolments is decreasing, from 558,000 in 2003/4 to 423,000 in 2006/7. One important issue is the fact that only 25% of courses are offered over the weekend.

2. Introduction

This study was commissioned by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport (DCMS) and Arts Council England (ACE) to improve the knowledge base on the voluntary and amateur arts sector in England. The study is the first of its kind on a national scale and represents the first step towards developing a comprehensive understanding of a very complex sector. The study considers two key aspects of the sector:

- Voluntary and amateur arts groups
- Informal adult learning in the arts.

Arts participation is increasingly recognised as valuable for individuals and communities, both for its intrinsic and instrumental value. Arts Council England held the Arts Debate to encourage the public to highlight their view of the role the arts play in their lives. A key finding of this debate was the "importance of the social aspect of the arts. People associated the arts with friendship, spending time with family and a sense of a shared experience. Often people come to art in the first place through these social networks and dynamics."¹ This research provides an opportunity to gain a stronger understanding of how the voluntary arts and adult learning feeds into an arts environment which is placing an increasing value on participation.

Voluntary and amateur arts activity happens in a wide range of settings and whilst it is often completely self-generated, it is also often closely related to other activities such as faith groups, community associations and learning. The voluntary and amateur arts sector is therefore a crucial player in encouraging people to access and participate in the arts. The sector is well positioned to reach people that would otherwise not engage and who are excluded from other aspects of society and community life, e.g. skills and expertise development. It is often in the voluntary arts sector that individuals get their first experience of participating in the arts, and the sector has a major impact on audience development for the broader arts sector.

Whilst a number of studies considering voluntary arts at a local and sub-regional level have been carried out, they have tended to use a broad definition encapsulating voluntary, amateur and community participation. This study focuses on participation in formally organised voluntary and amateur arts groups across eight categories: craft, dance, festivals, literature, media, music, theatre and visual arts. It looks specifically at:

- Voluntary and amateur arts groups that are governed or organised by those also participating in the activities, which members attend for reasons such as self-improvement, social networking or leisure, but primarily not for payment.
- Adult arts learning that does not lead to external accreditation and is undertaken for personal development, cultural enrichment, intellectual or creative stimulation and enjoyment.

The remit of the study did not include 'community arts' where a group is governed or organised by a paid individual (or individuals) or where the activity is organised on behalf of members. Nor did it include people who participate in an artform individually. The definition did not exclude voluntary arts groups that bring or buy in the skills of a professional for 'artistic direction', e.g. a conductor, dancer or sculptor.

The aims of the study are two-fold:

1. Examine the size, make-up and impact of the formal voluntary and amateur arts sector, providing an understanding of how groups are structured, what formal and informal support is available to them, what the challenges to and enablers of participation are and suggesting opportunities for growth of the sector.
2. Produce an authoritative evidence base about the arts in adult learning that can be used to help broaden and deepen levels of engagement in the arts and enable the development of individuals' skills and creativity.

The objectives of the study are therefore to:

- Estimate the size and make-up of the voluntary and amateur arts sector
- Examine the barriers to and enablers of participation
- Gather and assimilate existing information about the impact of voluntary arts
- Estimate the size and scale of adult learning in the arts and the infrastructure that supports it
- Understand the range and quality of existing provision
- Understand who participates in arts-related adult learning and the motivations for and barriers to their participation.

2.1 Methodology

The study was undertaken by TBR² over a period of six months between November 2007 and April 2008 and consisted of a programme of quantitative and qualitative research that included:

- Desk research to identify and review relevant literature contributing to the study. This process involved a combination of web-based research and contact with a number of organisations in order to identify and access published documents as well as any internal work or forthcoming evidence pertinent to the study.
- Consultation with the 'identifiable infrastructure' supporting voluntary and amateur arts activity in order to bring together the collective knowledge of the size and scale of the sector. This involved making telephone and email contact with approximately 300 supporting organisations and umbrella bodies to gather information and statistics on levels of participation in voluntary and amateur activity.
- A nationwide online survey amongst voluntary and amateur arts groups completed by approximately 2,200 groups. Completion and return of a paper copy of the survey was facilitated on request. The survey returned approximately 1,600 useable responses; 380 were returned with no data and 220 were completed by groups either not based in England or who did not fit the study definition of a voluntary and amateur group.
- Accessing and analysing a number of secondary data sources including the National Learning Directory (a government funded database of learning opportunities), the Learning and Skills Council's Individualised Learner Record for Adult Community Learning (data about learners and learning aims collected from providers that are in receipt of ACL funding) and the National Learner Satisfaction Survey (data on learners' satisfaction with and perceptions of education).
- A programme of 145 depth or case study telephone interviews with voluntary and amateur arts groups, local, regional and national supporting organisations, professionals working in the sector, Local Authorities, public and private learning providers and current and lapsed learners.

² TBR is the trading name of Trends Business Research Ltd

A key element of the project was providing an estimate of the total number of voluntary arts groups and people participating in them across England by artform and region. This was achieved by bringing together a range of information gathered over the course of the research. A key difficulty in quantifying the size the sector is that much of the activity, by its very nature, is unrecorded. There is no requirement for groups to be registered with an umbrella body or membership organisation, therefore there is no central source of information about the sector. The umbrella bodies, membership organisations, guilds, associations and supporting agencies that groups do interact with are therefore a crucial source of information on the population of groups.

At the outset of the project the research team compiled a comprehensive list of organisations that have the potential to interact with voluntary arts groups and undertook a consultation exercise to gather information from these organisations about the characteristics of the voluntary arts groups they were aware of. Using information provided by the Voluntary Arts Network and Voluntary Arts England combined with investigative research, a 'population' of 286 organisations was identified. These were all contacted by telephone and/or email: 117 returned useful information and 30 were excluded as they had no relationship with voluntary and amateur arts groups. Of the remaining 139 organisations, a significant proportion were unable to provide any information as to the voluntary or community or professional status of their contacts as their membership was very mixed, while others were simply unwilling to provide any information at all, or successful contact could not be made. Organisations were asked how many voluntary and amateur groups they were aware of, what information they could provide about their members and whether they would be willing to distribute information about the survey or provide contact information for their members.

The project relies on standard statistical techniques to generate population estimates for voluntary and amateur arts groups and their members. The information provided by the sample of 117 umbrella bodies enabled the production of an estimate (by artform) of the average number of groups that a supporting organisation is aware of and delivered detail on the proportionate distribution of groups by region. Applying these averages and distributions to the 'population' information enabled the production of an estimate of the total number of groups in England. Weighting factors for each group and survey response could then be applied to the sample data in order to calculate estimates of group and membership populations and to generate a range of additional analyses examining the activities, participation, income and expenditure within and by voluntary and amateur arts groups.

It is important here to recognise some of the limitations of this approach:

- Some of the voluntary arts are more formalised than others. For instance, amateur theatre and music are well represented by umbrella bodies whereas photography or book clubs, which are generally activities carried out in less formalised groups, are not. This means there is more opportunity for groups to belong to an umbrella body in some artforms than others.
- The estimate in this study is based upon groups that are members of, or associated with, a supporting organisation. As stated above, not all groups have a relationship with a supporting organisation, therefore the estimate of the number of groups delivered by the study should be viewed as an estimate, with recognition that without a census of groups a total figure will always have a degree of estimation about it.
- A number of supporting organisations deal with groups on a multi-artform basis and were unable to provide an accurate breakdown of the number groups they were aware of by artform. This was particularly the case for organisations such as the Women's Institute or sub-regional arts development organisations, which were aware of a significant number of groups, but not the artform. This has given rise to an estimate of a large proportion of 'multi-art' groups where the artform is either variable or unknown.

- Given the overlapping nature of some umbrella groups, there will be some element of double counting in estimates of numbers, but this is not easily mitigated.
- The study relies on groups to self-select as to whether or not they fit the definition of a voluntary and amateur arts group. Given the close relationship that many voluntary and amateur groups have with other group activities such as faith groups, community groups and so on, it is likely that many may classify their group according to associated group activity as opposed to the art group. This is particularly likely for minority faith groups.

Despite these limitations this study is founded on a robust approach and represents a significant step in understanding the importance of voluntary and amateur arts in our society.

3. The size and scale of the voluntary and amateur arts sector

A firm understanding of the size and scale of the voluntary and amateur arts sector is something that has long eluded those leading the development of the sector. It has always been known that many people participate in the arts on a voluntary basis, and that many people do so collectively in groups every week, fortnight and month across England. This study is the first step towards gaining a true picture of how many people participate in the arts in this way and what can be done to support their participation.

This first section of the report provides an overview of the key information about the size and scale of the sector produced by the study. The key headlines are:

- There are approximately 49,140 voluntary and amateur arts groups in England.
- 5.9 million people participate in voluntary and amateur arts groups across England.
- Voluntary and amateur arts groups generated a total income of £543m in 2006/07 and incurred expenditure of £406m.
- An additional 3.5 million people participated in voluntary and amateur arts groups in an auxiliary capacity as extras or helpers.
- 3.5 million women and 2.4 million men are engaged in voluntary and amateur arts.
- 1.8 million people aged between 45 and 64 take part in voluntary and amateur arts compared to only 506,700 people aged between 16 and 24.
- 97,100 members of voluntary and amateur arts groups are from a black or minority ethnic (BME) background.
- 154,000 members of voluntary and amateur arts groups consider themselves to have a disability.
- 2.4 million voluntary and amateur arts group members are employed (including self-employed).
- 147,000 people contribute to voluntary and amateur arts groups on a paid basis.
- 564,000 people undertake a management role within a voluntary or amateur arts group.

Table 1 (below) shows the estimated number of voluntary and amateur arts groups (associated with a supporting organisation) in England by region and artform. The region with the most groups is the South East with 9,140, followed by the South West, East and then London. Music is by far the most represented artform with 11,220 groups across England, followed by Theatre with 5,380 groups and Dance with 3,040.

Table 2 shows the estimated number of members of voluntary and amateur arts groups across England by region and artform. As with the groups, the region with the most members is the South East, with 1.3 million people, followed by the South West. However, while the East has the third largest number of groups, London and the North West have more members. This suggests that while there are a large number of groups in the East they tend to be small. Conversely, while the North East has the lowest proportion of groups, they do tend to be slightly larger and therefore give the region a higher level of participation.

Table 3 (below) considers the distribution and membership of groups across England alongside figures on total participation in the arts from the DCMS Taking Part survey. The table also shows the contribution that membership of a voluntary and amateur arts group makes to arts participation in England and each region.

The distribution of voluntary and amateur arts groups is similar to the distribution of people taking part in the arts in general across the country. The South East hosts the majority of groups, the highest proportion of members and one of the largest proportions of arts participation in general.

It is interesting to note the key role of voluntary and amateur arts groups in the South West, South East and North East in contributing to arts participation. Membership of a group is equal to a third of all arts participation in the South West and a quarter of participation in the South East and North East.

4. People and groups

This section of the report presents a range of information from the online survey and in-depth interviews with groups across England, considering the people who participate in groups and the format the groups take.

Key messages:

- At the core of the motivation to establish a voluntary arts group is the desire to participate in a particular artform or creative practice, with some groups occurring as a spin out from publicly funded arts activity or community activity.
- Word of mouth is the primary tool for attracting new members, followed by public events and links within the community, which develop a group's reputation for high quality activity and a welcoming social environment.
- The majority of people involved in the voluntary arts are employed and diversity tends to be dependent on the local area.
- The gender balance across the sector is approximately a 60:40 female/male split although there are some artforms where there is a higher propensity for single gender groups such as all female textile crafts or all male wood craft.
- 75% of groups feel that members join and remain involved in groups for enjoyment and appreciation of the artform.
- Membership of groups tends to be based on a sustainable core group of members around which a broader peripheral group of people will come and go.
- Some groups experience limits on the number of members they can accommodate, but develop approaches to addressing this either through expanding and diversifying activity or supporting people to set up their own groups.
- Many groups have a mixture of skill levels which enables members to mutually support each other's creative development.
- In certain sectors, particularly music and performing arts, there are a large number of groups which perform to a professional level and therefore audition for members who have reached a particular level of creative skills attainment.
- The major source of finance for the sector is from ticket or similar income (49%).
- Income levels are extremely variable, ranging from an average turnover of £1,600 in craft to £27,200 in festivals.
- Artistic and creative activity is planned and driven by the members of the groups.

4.1 Why are groups started?

There are many situations which lead to the establishment of a voluntary arts group. Many groups have been established for a considerable time, some for over one hundred years, so it is often difficult for current members to know the circumstances under which the groups were established. However, the primary driver is a desire to be involved in the particular artform, craft or practice.

In many circumstances a group of friends, neighbours or local people that already know each other will discover that they have a common creative interest and where there are existing groups in the area it is likely that these people will simply join those groups. However, if there is no local provision or if the groups in the area are up to their membership capacity this leads to people establishing a group of their own. This provides an opportunity for them to share their interest, become more formally involved and encourage other local people to get involved in the creative practice. In the case of more traditional artforms such as woodcraft, morris dancing or folk music, groups are often established by people with a desire to ensure that the artform and skills associated with it are not lost.

Groups have also been started as the result of publicly funded arts projects, exhibitions or events held in the area. This type of activity can generate a real interest in a particular artform amongst local people, but many projects only have time-limited funding. It is not unusual for local people to establish purely voluntarily run arts group at the culmination of a class or course or after funding for projects has finished and professional staff are no longer involved. This enables them to continue their engagement with the artform and further develop the skills which they have acquired as part of that project. Nor is it unusual for publicly funded projects to bring together arts groups – voluntary, community and professional – who otherwise may not have the opportunity to work together. This can often lead to interesting spin-offs with groups set up to try out new collaborations or work in new artforms.

Non-arts organisations such as community associations, Women's Institutes or older people's groups can also provide a hub around which creative activity can be generated. Some of these organisations will run arts activity as part of their broader remit or run taster sessions which generate an interest and provide people with an opportunity to try out an artform. This can lead to the development of independent, voluntarily run arts and crafts groups enabling people to develop more focused and ongoing opportunities to share their creative skills.

At the core of establishing any group is a strong motivation to participate in an artform, share creative output and skills and provide other people with the opportunity to get involved. Essentially, this is down to entrepreneurial individuals, either in groups or independently, spotting an opportunity, having a passion about a particular artform and finding ways of getting people together to make it happen. This entrepreneurial spirit is at the heart of both individual voluntary arts groups (even those which have been established for many years) and the sector as a whole.

4.2 Membership

4.2.1 How do people get involved?

Voluntary arts groups have a broad range of approaches to promotion/publicity. The majority of groups (average of 50%) attract members through word of mouth. The next most popular methods are the internet (16%) and the local press (14%). This pattern is not necessarily mirrored across artforms; literature and media groups rely less on word of mouth, with 20% of literature groups attracting new members through their local library and 11% of media groups attracting members by placing adverts in local shops or businesses. Music groups tend to make most use of the internet, with 20% of groups attracting members this way. Conversely craft groups make least use of the internet (9%). Most groups (70%) tend to use just one method of attracting new members.

Approaches to publicity are broad ranging and include producing leaflets and posters to be put in local libraries, shops or other venues, working closely with the local press to raise the profile of the group through advertising and editorials and developing a website for the group or being included on the listings websites of other organisations. Use of online publicity is fairly widespread; 54% of groups have a website, 21% have a presence on someone else's website and 9% have an entry on a social networking site. Craft, literature and visual arts groups are least likely to have a website with only 30% and 35% respectively having their own site.

Many groups also find that their public performances, exhibitions and open events are an invaluable approach to attracting members. This is the most public presence of the group in a community and is a key way for them to promote the quality of their work and activity and build a reputation that will encourage and inspire people to become members. Some groups run competitions, publish work or run festivals which generate a broader interest in the group and can encourage more people to get involved. These members might not join the group on an ongoing formal basis but may be involved in activity at particular times of the year or for particular events or activities.

Reputation and profile are therefore crucial for groups, both in terms of their artistic practice and their open and accessible ethos. In line with this, word of mouth is an invaluable way of getting members to join the group. Recommendations from trusted family and friends can often encourage people to get involved in an activity which they may otherwise find a little intimidating or unfamiliar. Groups work hard to build their reputation within the local community and place a high value on good relationships with residents and organisations in their area.

A lot of groups are open and do not have any specific membership criteria. If prospective members find out about the group they can simply turn up at a session and get involved. Where there are membership forms, this tends to be to enable the people who are running the group to keep up-to-date contact details for members and to find out what people are expecting from the group, helping to determine the types of activity they should be delivering.

There are, however, other instances where there are strict membership criteria, particularly in relation to level of attainment in the specific artform. This is often the case for music groups such as orchestras or choirs and for theatre groups. Many of these groups, although considered amateur, perform to a professional level and recruit members for particular roles or orchestral positions who have achieved a minimum performance standard. In these instances auditions are generally held and groups often have more people wanting to join than can be accommodated in the group or for particular productions or performances. Where this is the case, there are waiting lists to join the group and rather than turning people away they are encouraged to get involved in other important volunteer capacities, for instance front of house or behind the scenes.

4.2.2 Who gets involved?

Although a small number of groups have a fairly broad geographic spread, most groups are based on a very local membership. People who get involved in groups are generally those who have a keen interest in the particular artform and a desire to share that experience and develop their skills and it is not unusual for people to be a member of several local groups, often in various artforms.

A third of participants are aged between 45 and 64. The next largest age groups are 65-74 and 25-44, with 19% of members in each category. Craft, literature, visual art and media all have less than 5% of members aged below 25.

As shown in Table 4 (below) in terms of socio-economic status the highest proportion of people participating in voluntary and amateur arts groups are employed (42%), followed by 29% retirees and 23% full-time students.

Table 4: Socio-economic status of group members

Sub-artforms	Full-time student (including school)	Not employed	Employed (including self-employed)	Retired	Total
Craft	1%	11%	36%	54%	100%
Dance	51%	2%	37%	11%	100%
Festivals	47%	2%	22%	30%	100%
Literature	1%	6%	35%	53%	100%

Only 6% of respondents are not employed. This varies depending on the age distribution of participants; in sectors with fewer people below the age of 25 (craft, media, literature and visual art) there are very few full-time students and more retirees.

The diversity of groups tends to be dependent on the local area in which it operates. If the group is in a rural area with a low BME population then it will not have a particularly diverse membership. Groups are also conscious of their capacity and resources to manage diversity within a group. For example, it would be very difficult for an English speaking writers group to include people with low levels of literacy or those for whom English is not their first language. There are also instances where the artform has an impact on diversity of membership, for instance, morris dancing is a very traditional English artform and does not tend to attract people from diverse communities.

An average of 2% of group participants are from a BME background. There is little variance across the sector; craft has the highest proportion with 3% BME participants, followed by dance, festivals, literature and theatre with 2% and media, music and visual art with 1% BME participants. London has the most diverse groups with 10% BME members across all artforms, while the North East is the least diverse (0.3%). A number of interviewees felt that low rates of ethnic minority participation could be attributed to a lack of 'cross-over' between communities. Additionally a number felt that as many arts groups operate around faith or worship, some groups may not classify their activity as being voluntary and amateur arts and may therefore exclude themselves from the classification.

In terms of disability, many groups mentioned that they do have some members who might be considered disabled, but possibly not under the Disability Discrimination Act (DDA) definition. Equally, they felt that although some members may have some form of disability or impairment, they would not necessarily define themselves as disabled. Across the sector an average of 3% of participants would consider themselves to have a disability. Craft has the highest proportion of disabled participants (7%) followed by literature, visual arts and media (6%). Festivals have the lowest reported proportion of disabled participants (1%).

As a whole, the sector is fairly well balanced in terms of gender, enjoying a mix of male and female members. The survey revealed that an average of 59% of participants in voluntary and amateur arts are female and most groups tend to follow this pattern of a roughly 60:40 female/male split. However, the proportion of male and female participants varies across artforms. Craft has the highest proportion of female members (79%) and media the lowest (45%). Dance has the most even split with 52% male and 48% female members. In some artforms there is a tendency for groups to cater for either all-female or all-male membership. Examples include specifically gender-based music groups such as male voice choirs and less intentionally, groups that tend to attract either men or women, e.g. textile craft which tends to attract mainly female participants or wood craft, which tends to attract mainly men.

All groups consider themselves open and inclusive and do not actively discriminate against any potential members. There is a moderate level of fear about being judged on crude national targets for diversity and membership that are not relevant to local circumstances. It was felt that stipulated criteria would place too much of an emphasis on 'ticking boxes' and that the best way for groups to be inclusive is to focus on developing an open, welcoming, friendly and enjoyable environment which a broad range of people will be keen to be involved in.

4.2.3 Why do people continue to participate?

High on the list of motivation for continued participation is a desire to be better skilled at the particular artform. This does not necessarily mean that members are developing their skills to become professional artists, but rather for the sense of personal achievement. Many groups have a very broad skills base ranging from beginner through to experienced, which creates a mutually supportive environment where members are keen both to develop their own skills and support other members to do the same.

On average 75% of groups feel their members join for enjoyment and appreciation of the artform. This does vary significantly between artform, from 83% of members joining for enjoyment in music to 49% in craft. 31% of craft groups believe their members join to develop new skills and 8% for health or relaxation purposes. Media, festivals and visual arts groups also demonstrated a high rate of participation in order to develop new skills (approximately 25% in each artform). Participating for social benefit was, perhaps surprisingly, one of the lowest ranking reasons for joining, with an average of only 6% of groups identifying this as the main reason.

At the heart of many groups is the desire to share creative output with a broader audience. For example, writers only tells stories because they want people to read or hear them. Voluntary arts groups are a real opportunity for people to share their creative talents, both with other members of the group and with a broader audience. This sense of pride, particularly being part of a group which has a strong reputation for high quality output, is a key driver for people remaining involved.

People responsible for managing groups also work hard to develop programmes of interesting activity. This might be a broad range of workshops with high quality interesting speakers and demonstrators or a challenging and diverse music or performance programme and the opportunity to be involved in festivals, events and other public performances. It is this commitment to a broad range of high quality activity which helps groups to both attract new members and retain existing members by keeping their work interesting and engaging.

Although all groups are driven by the creative activity, underlying all of this is the sense of being amongst likeminded friends. As the membership of the group changes and new people join, this also provides the opportunity for people to make new friends and expand their social networks. Voluntary arts groups provide a real opportunity for people to socialise and have fun. If the activities were not enjoyable, people would not continue to participate in the groups.

There is a large proportion of older and retired people involved in voluntary arts groups; an average of 30% of members are retired and 25% are aged 65 or over. Such activity provides people who are retired with a real opportunity to continue their personal development and have the focus of formalised activity and social networks that would previously have been provided by their working environment.

4.2.4 Turnover of membership

The majority of groups are based on a strong and sustainable core membership around which a broader peripheral group of people will come and go. There seems to be general confidence across the sector that groups have a good turnover of membership which ensures their sustainability, with enough new members coming in to replace those who have left and thus keep the group running.

48% of groups have seen membership increase over the last five years. Craft and literature groups in particular have grown, with almost 60% of groups in each artform reporting an increase in members. On average, 38% of groups have seen static levels of membership. Media and dance have seen the most decline in participation; 21% and 18% of groups respectively have experienced decreased membership in the last five years.

Some groups are more informal than others. For instance, writers or craft makers will run sessions that people can drift in and out of, whereas amateur theatre and music groups need commitment from members to regularly attend rehearsals and commit time to backstage tasks such as set construction and costume design to ensure quality of performance. For the more informal groups it is often difficult to measure turnover of members as some people may not attend the group for long periods of time due to other commitments and will then get involved in sessions again at a later date when they have more free time.

Turnover of membership can also be dependent on the area that the group is based in. For instance, groups based in very stable and established rural communities with an older population will have less turnover of membership than a group based in an urban area with a more transient population. Turnover can also be cyclical, and groups which hold annual events or competitions will experience a large influx of new members as a result of these specific initiatives.

In general, the majority of groups do not seem concerned with turnover or losing members. There is often an acceptance that a group cannot be everything to everyone and while groups try to accommodate individual needs and aims, they will not necessarily be in a position to meet the expectation of every potential member. This is particularly the case where new members have a particular perception of what is on offer from the group which does not match the reality. Groups therefore focus on delivering activity which meets the expectations of the majority and retains an appropriately sized core membership. Although groups provide a flexible range of activities, they try to guard against being sidetracked into niche provision which only meets the needs of a small number of members and which could perhaps be better supported by another group in the area.

In terms of recruiting participants, 24% of groups feel that they are doing as much as they can to increase membership and 35% are taking some steps to recruit new members. 22% of groups would like to increase membership but are not taking any active steps to do so and 19% are happy to stay as they are. This does vary significantly between artforms; in literature, for example, 38% of groups would prefer to maintain their current membership and only 16% are actively seeking to increase membership. Media groups show the highest propensity to actively recruit participants, with 45% doing as much as they can on this front. One might therefore also expect dance groups, which saw a similar decline in membership to media, to be as active in recruitment; however, only 25% are doing as much as possible to increase membership.

4.2.5 Membership capacity

Voluntary arts groups recognise that not all members will attend all sessions, so there is an optimum level of membership which will ensure there is a good turnout for the majority of sessions, making the activity both creatively and financially viable. Generally groups are happy with an organic and healthy turnover of membership and will only proactively recruit if the overall membership becomes too low to sustain the activity of the group.

For some groups the number of people they can accommodate is limited by the size of the venue they use. Often groups have a long standing relationship with their venue and have negotiated a low rate or even get the facility free, making it financially risky to secure an alternative venue. This problem is exacerbated in areas where there is limited choice of suitable venues for groups to hire at a reasonable rate. The decision to move the group to a larger, more expensive venue can be a particularly challenging one. They have to be confident that there will be a sustainable increase in membership to enable them to cover any increased venue costs through increased subscriptions or session fees. In some cases, groups will address the issue of venue limitations by running a series of smaller groups and sessions at different times, enabling them to accommodate a broader membership, only requiring a larger venue on the limited number of occasions, often social, when they bring the full membership together at one time.

Other groups are conscious that the number of members can impact on the quality of activity and the experience of being involved in the group. Once attendance at individual sessions gets too high, it becomes difficult to ensure that everyone has an opportunity to be actively involved. For many groups sessions involve supporting members to develop their expertise. A good example of this is writers groups where members do 'homework' around particular themes which are then discussed in detail at the following session. If there are too many members, the opportunity for people to share work, have feedback from other members and input into the critiques of other people's work are limited. Similarly, a large membership for very interactive groups would require sessions to last several hours, which is impractical in terms of both the time which people are able and willing to commit and the cost of hourly room hire.

It is also important to recognise that on the whole, the larger the group membership, the more complex and time consuming the management requirements become. There are a large number of groups who actively ensure that management is kept to a minimum. This is because they feel that the burden of management can distract from the enjoyment of being involved in the group and they are concerned that there may be challenges getting members to volunteer for management roles, resulting in the responsibility being on the shoulders of only one or two members.

Although groups are conscious of their capacity limitations, at the heart of what they do is a passion for enabling likeminded people to get involved in their artform. Many groups highlighted that if they are approached by potential new members when their group is at full capacity they actively support those people in establishing their own group. Others, who are comfortable with the additional management, expand their activity and run extra sessions to accommodate more members.

4.2.6 Artistic and creative skill levels

One of the primary drivers for people to get involved in voluntary arts groups is to develop their skills in artistic and creative practice. One of the key approaches to enabling this is through mutual support from within the membership, while the level of skill expected for potential and existing members tends to vary across artforms.

The majority of groups in artforms such as literature, visual arts or crafts do not stipulate the level of skill which prospective members need to display before they join. Groups therefore have a broad range of skills, ranging from complete beginners through to experts, and this is usually seen as a real bonus for the group. It provides an opportunity for members to share experience and expertise and create a mutually supportive learning environment for all involved. There are some instances in music groups where there is also a mix of expertise. However, it was recognised that this can present some challenges in relation to artistic programming. For instance, for music groups with a broad mix of expertise, careful attention has to be paid to ensuring that the programme of music is not so challenging that it is beyond the capability of less experienced members yet is still interesting and demanding enough for the more accomplished players.

In music and theatre particularly, there are a large number of groups which strongly stipulate the level of competence of their membership. This is because many of these groups, e.g. orchestras and choirs, although amateur, perform to a professional standard so are not in a position to accept members who do not meet these standards. Although some groups do struggle to get performers for particular instruments or performance roles, on the whole they do not struggle to recruit members. Many groups stated that they hold regular auditions for membership and often have waiting lists of people who would like to join.

4.3 Management

4.3.1 Management and administrative structures

All groups require some level of administration and there are a broad range of approaches to group management across the voluntary arts sector. Because the sector is generally financially self-reliant, these structures and governance models are developed based on the needs of the groups rather than on funder demands. Groups therefore develop the most appropriate management structure for their specific circumstances, ensuring that the level of management is proportionate to the size, activity and complexity of the groups and, crucially, is complementary to the 'culture' and ethos of the membership.

22% of groups do not have a constitution and groups without a constitution tend to be smaller. There is significant variance between artform here. 53% of literature and 40% of craft and dance groups operate without a constitution, compared to only 13% of theatre and 20% of media and music groups. London has the highest proportion of non-constituted groups, with 33% of groups in the region operating without a constitution. Groups in the North East are most likely to be constituted, with only 12% not having a constitution. It is interesting to note that the region with the most constituted groups also has the largest groups.

On average, each voluntary arts group has eight managing members. This varies between artform, from five in craft, dance and literature, to 13 in festivals. Media and music groups tend to have seven managing members, theatre nine and visual art six. Clearly, the level of management required varies drastically across the sector. A large amateur dramatic group, which owns or manages a venue and programmes 6-12 public performances throughout the year, will require a much more structured approach to management than a more informal craft group, which runs ongoing sessions throughout the year and perhaps has just one small scale annual public exhibition.

The approach to governance and management within the sector is highly entrepreneurial and groups will develop flexible structures which operate as and when needed. During general ongoing operation, for instance, a group may take a very minimalist, low-level approach which ensures that the basic needs are covered. However, at times when they are in receipt of grant funding to run additional projects they will adopt a more structured approach to ensure that they are meeting the funders' requirements.

Those groups which have developed a management and committee structure have not done so to create a hierarchy, but rather to enable them to spread the responsibility of management across a number of members. There is strong recognition that running an interesting and varied programme relies on a huge amount of time and commitment from a management committee and there is a danger that this can become burdensome. A structured approach to management guards against this overload and makes it easier for groups to encourage and recruit members to take on some of the management responsibility.

The tasks required to manage groups are broad ranging, including co-ordinating activity and communicating with members, managing the accounts and legal responsibilities of the group, marketing, press and publicity and sourcing and hiring performance, rehearsal and meeting venues. It is very difficult to quantify the time spent managing groups. Although many groups spend time in formal management committee meetings, a lot of activity goes on behind the scenes with individuals taking on particular tasks in their own time. Levels of management required can also be cyclical depending on the activity of the group, for instance if a group runs an event once a year the amount of time members will have to commit to management activity will need to increase to accommodate that event.

Groups also have a range of processes to encourage members to take on management responsibilities. For smaller, more informal groups it is generally the case that people simply 'muck in'. Larger groups tend to hold an AGM at which new members are elected to the committee as and when vacancies come up. In these cases people either volunteer their services or potential candidates are approached by existing committee members in advance of the AGM to ascertain if they are willing to be elected. When specific tasks are identified, during ongoing management, committee members either volunteer or are nominated to take responsibility for ensuring that those tasks are delivered. Groups that have a formal management structure feel that this makes it easier for them to recruit committee members and get people to take on responsibility for particular tasks as the management of the group had been broken down into manageable 'bite-sized chunks'.

Crucially, all groups recognise that the success of their group is thanks to the unpaid and willing commitment of time, and in some cases money, of their core membership. It is also recognised that no task is more important than any other and that the amount of time required or committed bears no relation to its resulting value, as even the smallest contribution is essential for keeping the group running effectively. All input to group management is highly valued and is recognised as one of the sector's most important assets.

4.3.2 Financial management

The major source of income (49%) for groups is ticket income or similar. This varies significantly across artforms, from 61% of all theatre income from tickets to only 23% in craft, 16% in visual art and 12% in literature.

Visual art relies far more on subscriptions and/or membership fees, as does craft (48% and 47% of income respectively). Literature groups are more likely than any other artform to receive Arts Council Lottery funding or funding from another lottery distributor, with 44% of funding coming from this source. Music groups are fairly evenly balanced between subscriptions and/or membership fees (32%) and tickets (39%) as the main source of income.

Table 6 (below) shows that a major area of expenditure for groups is hiring professional artists to contribute to the group. 31% of expenditure across the sector is in this area. Although the level of expenditure varies across groups, only media spends less than 19% of total expenditure on professionals. Music spends the most with 47% of expenditure being on professionals.

Rehearsal/meeting venues are an extremely variable cost for groups, with the proportion of expenditure ranging from only 1% in festivals to 30% in dance and visual art. There is similar variation in spend on performance/exhibition venues.

19% of groups turn over between £1,001 and £2,500 per year, a further 15% turn over between £2,501 and £5,000 and 11% between £501 and £1,000. Some groups do have a much higher turnover; festivals and theatre groups tend to turn over the most averaging £27,200 and £22,700 respectively. Festivals and theatre also demonstrate the highest variation in turnover and are the only artforms to turn over more than £150,000. Craft groups have the lowest average turnover at £1,600 per year. Dance, literature and visual art groups all turn over a similar average of between £2,300 and £2,400 per year. Music and media turn over an average of £7,100 and £3,200 respectively. Perhaps unsurprisingly, London shows the highest average turnover per group (£37,000). The West Midlands has the lowest average turnover at £8,700, followed interestingly by the South East with £9,300.

Patterns of average expenditure follow a similar trend to patterns of income. Festivals and theatre have the highest average expenditure, spending £19,000 and £16,200 respectively. Craft, dance and visual art groups have the lowest levels of expenditure, each spending between £1,600 and £1,800. Overall, media expenditure is higher than income, craft just breaks even and all other artforms make some (even if only a little) profit. Festivals and theatre make the highest return.

4.3.3 Planning and developing artistic activity

Each group plans the timing of its meetings to ensure the maximum possible member engagement. The most popular meeting format is a weekly meeting lasting between one and two hours, with 28% of all groups using this format. The second most popular is a weekly meeting lasting between two and three hours (29% of groups). Only 3% of groups meet for less than one hour.

Half of all groups meet on weekly basis. Meeting monthly is the next most popular interval (17% of groups) followed by fortnightly (8%) and quarterly (7%). Weekly meetings are particularly common amongst dance, music and theatre groups. Theatre and music groups are also the artforms most likely to meet multiple times per week (usually in the weeks preceding a performance). Craft, literature and visual arts groups tend to favour a monthly meeting, while media groups are balanced between weekly and fortnightly meetings. Craft meetings tend to last the longest, with 37% of meetings in the artform lasting for more than three hours.

Smaller, more informal groups generally take a collaborative approach to planning artistic activity. Individuals will bring forward ideas for activity, themes for sessions or suggestions for speakers and workshops, which will then be discussed and agreed by the broader membership. This creates very strong ownership of the programme for the group and ensures that all members get an opportunity to contribute their ideas and influence activity. Many groups are conscious that they cannot please all of their members all of the time but feel this approach ensures that there is a broad range of activity. This ensures that over the course of the year there is something for all members to engage in, even if they choose not to collaborate in other sessions which are not of particular interest to them.

Other groups, particularly music and performance groups, take a different approach to programming. Many of these groups employ an artistic director who selects productions or orchestral pieces for the group to perform. Importantly, such a post is always recruited with the ethos of the membership in mind to ensure that programming decisions are made in the context of the agreed objectives, culture and ambitions of the group. The group, both in the broader membership and through the management committee, still has influence over the programming as the employer of the artistic director. It is therefore strongly positioned to question any artistic decisions which it is uncomfortable with and, in extreme cases, terminate the contract with a particular individual.

Essentially, voluntary arts groups pride themselves in providing a broad range of high quality artistic activity which is both interesting, challenging and developmental for their members and engaging, captivating and entertaining for their audiences. Although groups have different approaches to developing their artistic programme, their membership is always at the heart of the decision-making.

5. Infrastructure and support

The following section considers the infrastructure and support that groups make use of. The section begins though with a note on self-sufficiency, a recurring theme of high importance for groups across all artforms.

Key messages:

- Voluntary arts groups are self-sufficient and entrepreneurial but still need access to relevant and up-to-date support, advice and information.
- The sector receives a significant amount of informal support and good will from family, friends and the local community, highlighting the value which is placed on voluntary arts activity.
- Sharing the creative output of the group either through exhibitions or performances is a crucial element of voluntary arts activity and groups place a high value on the support they receive from their audiences.
- Groups tap into a broad network of support organisations including Local Authority arts officers, artform-specific umbrella and membership bodies and organisations established at a regional or sub-regional level to support the development of arts activity.
- The arts and culture are recognised in a range of community development strategies at a local and regional level, but these strategies tend to overlook the voluntary arts sector and the impact it makes both in terms of community development and quality of artistic practice.
- Networking amongst groups is not consistent and some groups have concerns regarding competition from other arts activity, both voluntary sector and professional, in their local area.
- There are links with the professional sector, with a large number of groups employing professional artists either on a long-term basis or on an ad hoc basis as speakers and tutors.

5.1 Self-sufficiency

Voluntary arts groups are extremely entrepreneurial and rely heavily on the expertise and experience of the members of their groups. A large number of the organisations that responded to the survey highlighted that their membership was primarily made up of employed or retired people who have a broad range of professional management skills and networking opportunities which they bring to the group. This means that they are generally very good at problem solving within the group and if the management expertise is not available within the membership, someone is likely to have connections which will enable them to access this expertise.

However, although there are high levels of management skills within the sector, it is important for groups and supporting organisations not to assume that this means no support is needed. It is particularly important to recognise that although groups may have good management skills this does not mean that they have an in-depth knowledge of more specific issues in areas such as artform development and networks and legislation such as charities law, companies law, child protection and performance licensing.

The management expertise of members of voluntary arts groups is highly valued and should be more broadly recognised as an asset to both the development of artistic practice and the broader impact of the voluntary arts sector. Many of these groups do not need significant hand-holding. However, they do require, and deserve, easy access to appropriate and up-to-date information and a commitment from the supporting infrastructure to champion their efforts and raise the profile of the high quality work which they are committed to achieving.

5.2 Informal support

The term 'informal support' is used in this report to refer to assistance which is not received through regulated, structured or formally organised agreements. Sometimes this support comes from people who are not members of the group but give up their time to support activity for specific events or initiatives. Some groups do have members who are not interested in participating in artistic activity themselves but are committed to being involved in the group and give their time in crucial support roles. As shown in Table 8 below, an additional 3.5 million people participated in voluntary and amateur arts groups in an auxiliary capacity as extras or helpers across 2006/07, bringing the total number of people involved in the sector to 9.4 million.

Table 8: Total number of people involved in sector

Groups identified the following different types of informal support:

- 'Advice' or administration assistance, including advice on funding applications and useful information from contacts.
- 'Donations' received as one-off payments (rather than formal sponsorship). Local businesses have been highlighted by a large number of groups as invaluable supporters of voluntary arts activity.
- 'Good will' from local figures and the community in general, in the form of positive attitudes and providing opportunities e.g. through extending invitations to voluntary and amateur groups.
- 'ICT or the Internet', which is often used as an informal resource.
- 'Premises/rent discount' – while this may be contractual (and therefore formal), many groups enjoy the use of reduced cost or free premises on the basis of an informal agreement.
- 'Other discounts' received by voluntary and amateur groups included rates and/or insurance premium reductions where informally agreed.
- 'Publicity' in the form of free (usually local) press coverage was frequently identified as a vital form of informal support. It also refers to word of mouth communication.

- 'Teaching/skills assistance', including technical support and informal support from skilled practitioners across the full range of artforms, such as conductors, stagehands and choreographers who gave their time voluntarily.
- 'Other informal' – this includes assistance from family and friends with transport, catering, ushering and boosting audience numbers, as a few examples.

Table 9 shows that across all artforms, 'other informal' is the mostly commonly received form of informal support (32% of all groups), followed by good will at 20% and premises/rent discount and donations at 10%.

This does vary by artform. Media groups tend to receive the most informal support in the form of both advice (29%) and good will (38%). However, theatre and dance groups also tend to rely on significant amounts of good will, perhaps due to their need to draw an audience and develop a positive reputation. Craft groups showed high levels of informal support in terms of premises/rent discount (33%). Finally, festival and music groups received the highest levels of informal support through donations (17% and 15% respectively).

The support needed from family and friends varies across the sub-sectors of the voluntary arts. Very small informal groups, particularly those that hold their sessions in private homes, are thankful to the support of their families opening up their homes and providing refreshments for the members, with a little extra support if the group puts on a larger workshop session or exhibition. At the other end of the scale, putting on a production or exhibition requires a lot of input above and beyond the performers and exhibitors. For example, amateur theatre groups rely on significant amounts of support from their friends and family. This ranges from front of house activity such as box office and selling programmes through to back stage tasks ranging from building sets through to making costumes, all of which are essential to the quality of experience for the audience.

Local communities on the whole place a high value on and have a lot of good will towards the voluntary arts groups in their area. Groups often rely on the local community to promote their work both in terms of encouraging new members to join and generating audiences for performances. It is common for local shops and venues to hold leaflets and posters produced by the groups and, through word of mouth, generate an interest and buzz around the group's activity. Local businesses have been highlighted by a large number of groups as invaluable supporters of voluntary arts activity. Support from businesses is broad ranging and can include the donation of money and sponsoring activity, donating gifts which can be used for raffles and fundraisers and providing venues or loan of equipment for use by the group at low or often no cost.

All groups place a very high value on the support which they get from their friends, family and local community and recognise that they often rely heavily on good will for the ongoing support of their group. They therefore have a very strong commitment to ensuring that they show their gratitude, provide reciprocal support for other community activity and work hard to ensure that the group has a good reputation and is seen as being of value to individuals and the broader community.

5.3 Audiences

Table 10 shows the number of performances put on by voluntary and amateur groups per year and total audience attendance. On average 220 people attend each performance.

For many groups, particularly performing arts groups, the continued support of their audiences is one of their most valued assets and the opportunity to perform and share their creative output with a wider audience is the life blood of the majority of voluntary arts groups. What is the point of writing a story if nobody reads it or hears it and what is the point of developing an exceptional musical talent if it is only ever performed in the privacy of your own home?

Support from audiences has a vital role to play in relation to the sustainability of groups. Financially it is the commitment from audiences to continue coming to performances and buying tickets and programmes that enables a group to continue performing and providing an opportunity for members to participate. Equally, for groups across the whole spectrum of the voluntary arts, their public activity is the key to them demonstrating the quality of the work they do and raising the profile of the group, which in turn encourages new members to join.

It is not surprising, then, that there is a strong commitment from groups to develop programmes of activity which sustain their reputation and encourage audiences to engage with what they do. This ranges from a craft group presenting small scale local exhibitions through to a professional standard orchestra performing large-scale symphonies at high-profile music venues.

5.4 Formal support infrastructures

The sector is supported by a vast network of organisations and individuals that all contribute in different ways, either through providing support directly to a voluntary or amateur arts group or by assisting organisation. In order to provide an insight into the formal support available, the following section identifies the key information from a programme of in-depth interviews undertaken with local, regional and national supporting organisations. Support across these levels is used to varying extents by voluntary groups; 67% of groups surveyed had links with a national umbrella body/organisation, 28% with a local and 5% with a regional body. Dance and media groups demonstrated the most linkages, with 90% of groups associated with some form of organisation. This was followed by festivals, theatre and music (80%). Literature, craft and visual arts groups showed the least propensity to form linkages, with only half of groups being associated with a supporting organisation.

Formal support organisations are a key source of information, guidance and advice for voluntary arts groups. Figure 1 on pages 36 and 37 shows the organisations, individuals and participating bodies operating within the sector and the information flow between them. The diagram is divided into local, regional and national levels and organisations/bodies are colour coded according to their focus of activity. The sector's supporting infrastructure is shown in the medium and dark blue bands. In many instances organisations overlap the geographical boundary lines or coloured bands; this demonstrates activity at multiple geographical levels or the provision of support combined with participation in the sector.

5.4.1 Local Authority support

Local Authority arts development officers can play a crucial role in supporting the sector at a local level, although the picture can be patchy across the country. The kind of support they can offer includes advice and guidance, logistical support to help groups run events, promotional support and providing access to performance, rehearsal and meeting space at a reduced or no cost. Many Local Authority arts officers also run small pots of funding for voluntary art groups which can support them in developing new activity, getting access to professional speakers/demonstrators or developing publicity and websites. On average, however, voluntary arts groups only receive 4% of their income from Local Authorities. This varies by artform (theatre and literature groups, for example, receive 8% and 7% respectively of their income from Local Authorities) but the figures are still low.

Most Local Authority arts officers do not see supporting the voluntary arts as their core remit and many give support in an ad hoc manner when they are approached, rather than proactively engaging with the sector. The Local Authority arts officers who were interviewed for this research felt that voluntary and amateur arts were an important part of the arts sector, playing a valuable role in local communities and offering great opportunities to participate, particularly for people and communities who might otherwise not engage with the arts. Despite this, they felt that voluntary groups were not central to their activity as local arts officers. Although most Local Authorities have cultural and arts development strategies, voluntary arts are often unrepresented in these strategies.

Many arts officers are tied to broader strategic development and regeneration programmes within their authorities. Arts development is generally recognised as a key factor in the development of local planning and regeneration policies, for example. This can lead to funds from non-arts budgets being made available for arts activity, but not necessarily for supporting voluntary arts groups. The need for Local Authority arts officers to feed into strategic development can mean they have very limited capacity to provide a significant amount of 'hands-on' support for a large number of groups. This is a particular challenge for arts officers who have to balance the need for strategic development with a desire to connect more closely with arts groups at the grass roots level. Many arts officers can only signpost groups to other sources of support and advice, such as Arts Council regional offices and local Council for Voluntary Service (CVS) organisations. Although CVS organisations do not specialise in arts activity, they can provide one-to-one guidance on issues such as constitutions and governance and accessing funding.

There is also work at national level to make the case for investment in arts activity, particularly activity which encourages participation. In 2007 the Local Government Association published Taking part counts: the contribution of art, culture and sport to national outcomes. Prepared by IDeA, the Improvement and Development Agency, this publication aims to support cultural services to strengthen their data and performance measurement and demonstrate the impact that cultural activity has on local development priorities.

Our research suggests that voluntary and amateur groups account for almost a fifth of all arts participation in England. It is good to see that there is a strong commitment to the value of culture and arts to local communities. However, there is some concern that Local Authorities which overlook the voluntary arts sector and do not recognise the contribution it makes or provide the necessary support services are seriously missing a significant opportunity to support the growth of truly community-driven arts participation. This mixed attitude towards the voluntary arts sector may begin to change with the introduction this year of local data collection on levels of arts engagement, which will enable comparisons to be made between Local Authorities for the first time. The new National Indicator 11 on local arts engagement may also have an impact.

5.4.2 Regional and sub-regional arts bodies

The mapping exercise undertaken at the outset of this study identified more than 60 organisations across the country which have been established to develop the arts infrastructure at a regional or sub-regional level. Many of them are Arts Council Regularly Funded Organisations (RFOs) and many receive core funding from Local Authorities and other regeneration bodies and will secure funding for specific initiatives from a range of other bodies, including trusts and foundations. Their primary role is to develop and support the broad arts sector including professional artists and arts organisations, community arts projects and the voluntary arts sector. They also help develop social and economic regeneration strategies and arts development policies at a local, sub-regional and regional level.

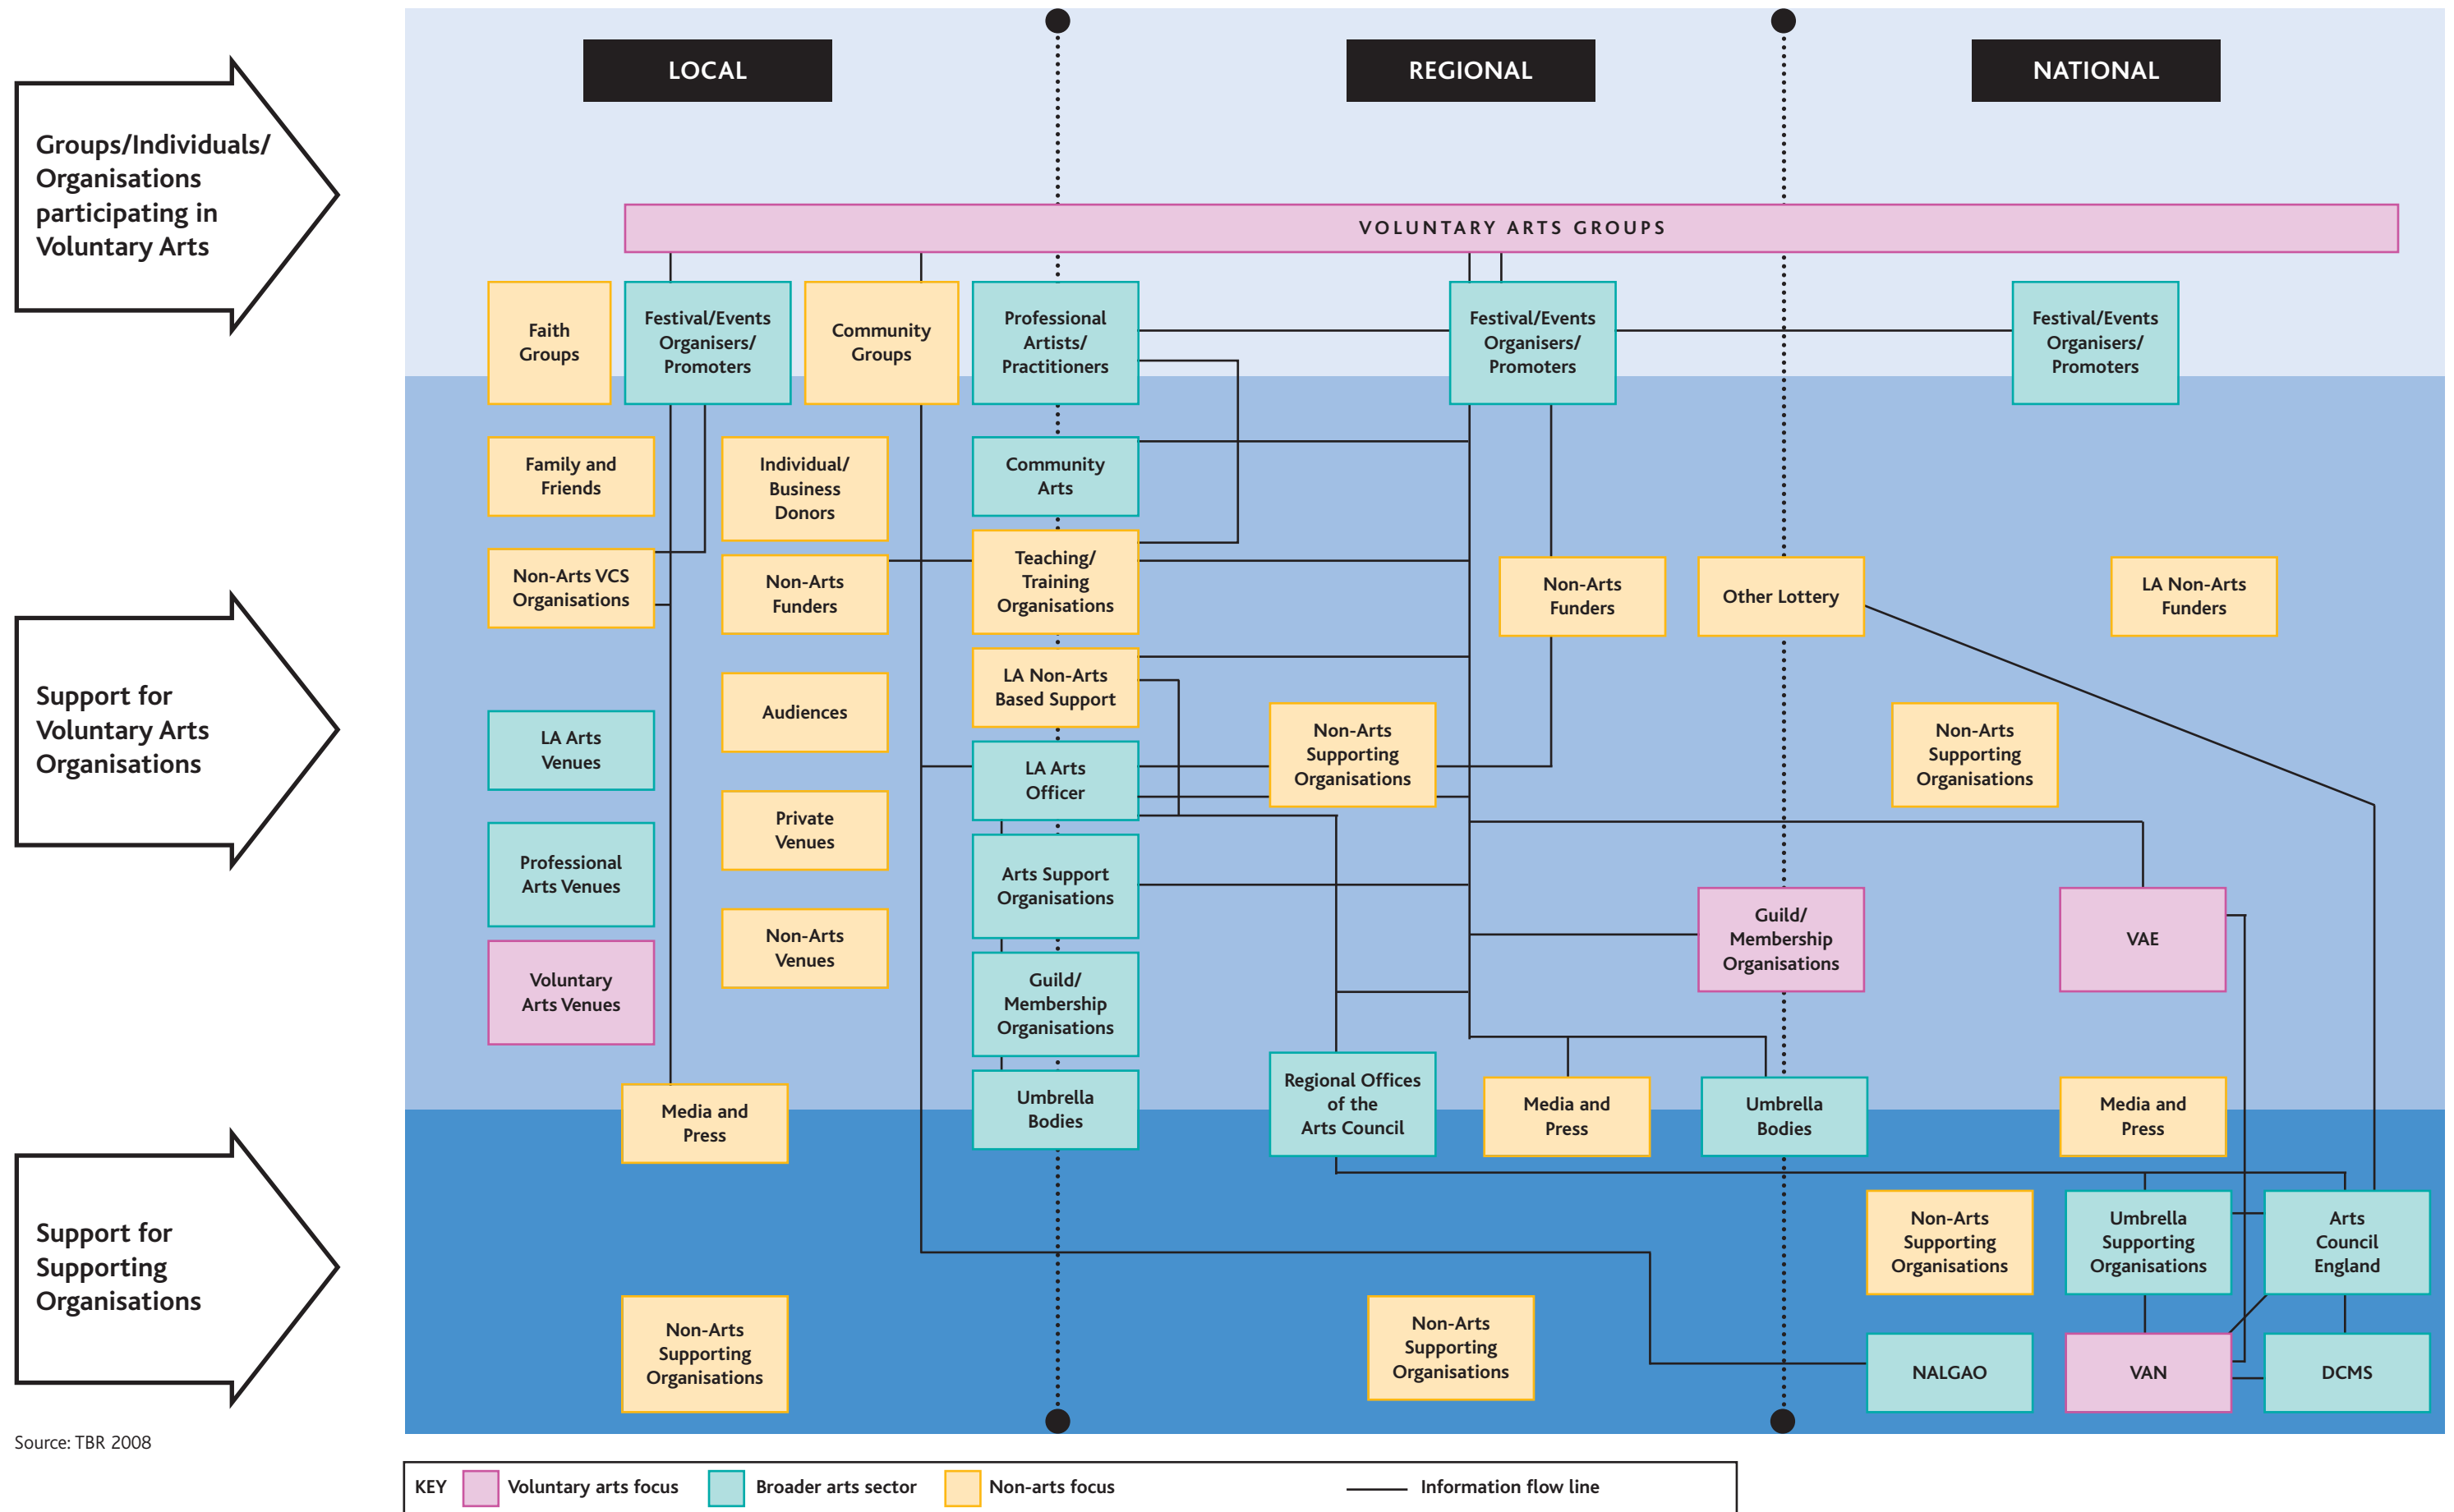

A key role for these organisations is to provide advice and guidance. It is difficult to quantify the number of voluntary arts organisations which are supported through this part of the infrastructure, but the support organisations which were interviewed for this study reported that they were regularly approached by voluntary arts groups, particularly at start-up stage, for advice on constitutional, legal and governance issues and for signposting to funders and advice on making applications for grants. However, only one of the support organisations interviewed was specifically established to focus on supporting the voluntary arts sector, providing targeted, focused and bespoke support to voluntary arts groups and a voice for the sector.

Many of the arts support organisations are also responsible for delivering project-funded community arts activity which also has an impact on the voluntary arts sector. These initiatives often provide opportunities for voluntary arts groups to participate in festivals and arts development activity involving community and professional arts organisations, enabling them to develop networks and contacts, build their skills and raise their profiles. It is also not unusual for voluntary arts groups to be established as a result of such activity. When the funding for the arts project has come to an end the chance to be involved in arts activity has often created a spark amongst a group of local people who will then go on to set up their own group to enable them to have continued participation in the artform.

The regional and sub-regional support organisations we spoke to felt they were effective because they were relatively local and embedded in the arts infrastructure of the area they work in. This means they are accessible and trusted by the arts communities they served and recognised as having a detailed knowledge of a specific and valuable sector.

All the organisations we interviewed felt that the voluntary sector was a valuable part of the arts infrastructure and they were concerned that sometimes this was not fully recognised by policy makers outside the sector. There was concern that there is often a misconception that the sector's activity is poor quality and that as a result the professional sector was often unduly prioritised over the voluntary arts. This meant that many policy makers were missing a major opportunity to increase opportunities for participation.

5.4.3 National umbrella bodies and organisations

The mapping exercise undertaken at the outset of the study identified more than 250 national organisations supporting voluntary arts in some capacity. Their primary objective is to support amateur groups (and often individuals) participating in an artform and many undertake considerable additional work to promote new participation. The Voluntary Arts Network acts as an 'umbrella body of umbrella bodies', promoting participation in the arts and crafts, helping to develop the sector and working on behalf of umbrella bodies.

The proactivity of umbrella bodies can vary quite significantly. Some are extremely active in lobbying for their artform, while others prefer to remain more reactive to the needs of the groups and individuals engaged in the artform. In some cases this depends on how proactive the organisation's chair and board are. The funding arrangements for umbrella organisations vary significantly. Many operate solely on membership subscriptions and, depending on the level of membership, this can often restrict the range of activities and services the organisation is able to provide. Some organisations are in receipt of regular funding from Arts Council England. Many also rely on fundraising and income from sales and events.

On the whole, the activity of umbrella organisations is driven by the needs of their members but many organisations also play a role in developing the sector. Their activity is often a balance of following demand and leading change and development. The proactivity of members also tends to vary, from those who are members simply for the purpose of 'kite-marking' the group at one end of the scale, to those who are looking for a high level of support to assist in exploring new and different ventures at the other. The majority of members, however, use umbrella bodies as a source of support and guidance, using services on a needs basis.

Information provision is a key function for national bodies and information is disseminated in a range of formats. Umbrella bodies tend to provide advice specific to their artform and related to running a group. Organisations answer direct queries from groups and will signpost any queries which they can not answer. Information is distributed in a variety of formats such as magazines, briefing papers, bulletins, emails and online. The Voluntary Arts Network in particular is very proactive in producing information, which is distributed to its network of umbrella bodies who are encouraged to re-package and distribute the information to their membership. This process has evolved through recognition that groups are often more receptive to information received from an artform-specific organisation.

A number of umbrella organisations offer specific services to groups, either related to artistic or operational practice, for example:

- Making Music has developed a 'Block Insurance' package that is available to all members. The package provides a basic range of cover suitable for most music groups with the option of additional cover to meet particular requirements. The insurance is renewed by Making Music with subscription fees and provides groups with a convenient and much simplified method of sourcing insurance.
- The National Operatic and Dramatic Association (NODA) offers a number of services through its regional committees to support the development of productions, for example assistance with casting, access to choreographers, reviewing productions and so on.
- Some umbrella organisations also deliver workshops, conferences, seminars and training sessions. Others run festivals or events involving a range of their members. This is hugely valued as it is an opportunity for groups to meet like-minded people, share experiences and perform new pieces with other groups.

5.5 Venues

Voluntary arts groups use a broad range of venues for a broad range of purposes including formal management meetings, artistic sessions, workshops and training, rehearsal and performance and exhibitions. Groups are also keen to provide opportunities for their members to socialise outside the formal activity of the group, so many look for a venue that can also provide space for social interaction. Some groups need quite complex spaces in which to practise, for instance a potters group will require wet and dry space, space for storage and use of glazes and chemicals and specialist equipment including kilns and wheels.

21% of groups meet in a community or village hall, 19% in a church, church hall or other religious building, 13% meet in a private residence and 13% meet in a school or other educational establishment. Only 9% of groups meet in an designated Arts Venue. Craft, dance, theatre and visual arts groups most commonly meet in community or village halls. Music groups tend to meet in either a church, church hall or other religious building or a school. Literature and media groups commonly meet in a private residence, though media groups also make the most use of Arts Venues out of all artforms. The artform least likely to use an Arts Venue is dance. Schools seem to be becoming an increasingly valuable potential venue, particularly specialist schools which can provide arts groups with access to high quality purpose-built space and specialist facilities and equipment.

The majority of groups use just one meeting venue. Literature and theatre groups show the highest propensity to use multiple venues, with 22% and 21% respectively using two to three venues. Music and dance groups are least likely to use multiple venues, with 86% and 84% respectively using only one venue. Most groups have been in their venue for a long period of time and have negotiated a reduced rent or even free access. There are also a number of groups who own or manage their own permanent venue, although numbers vary across artforms. On average 6% of groups fall into this category.

It is important that venues are accessible and in a central location to ensure easy access for both members and audiences. In the case of performance venues it is important that they are in a location which has a good catchment area to attract the level of audiences required to ensure that performances are financially viable. In rural areas access to public transport, particularly if meetings finish after 9pm, can be a challenge. However, groups tend to get around this by ensuring that venues are as central as possible, have a good level of affordable parking and are perhaps rotated to cover a broader geographic membership. Generally, groups which do not have access to good public transport overcome this problem by car sharing between members.

Importantly, it is not just the venues supporting the voluntary arts sector; voluntary arts groups are key to supporting the venues (see Table 14, page 47). Performances, ongoing rehearsals and meetings held by voluntary arts group are a key part of demand for community venues, which ensures that they are financially viable and can continue to provide services to their local community. Voluntary arts groups also add vibrancy to these venues, encouraging more and more people to use local facilities.

5.6 Networking with other arts groups

There is a mixed perception of both the level of collaboration and networking between voluntary arts groups and its value. Interviews with arts support organisations and Local Authority officers highlighted a concern that the quality of networks amongst voluntary arts groups was varied, with a prevailing impression that they did not interact to a notable extent and tended to 'keep themselves to themselves.' However, it is important to recognise that these comments are sometimes based solely on personal perceptions.

Some groups who responded to the survey felt quite strongly that other arts groups in the area – either voluntary or those supported by public sector funding – were in direct competition with them for members and audiences. Others were more confident about their relationship with other groups and were keen to explore opportunities for collaboration, networking and joint activity. Organisations who were members of umbrella bodies saw the opportunity to develop connections with other members of the body, locally, regionally and nationally, as a positive benefit of being a member of that organisation.

Many groups placed high value on opportunities to be involved in festivals which incorporated performances from a range of arts organisations across a range of artforms. It was recognised that this provided opportunities to make connections and be 'on the same bill' as professional arts organisations and artists, although there was sometimes concern that voluntary arts groups were not necessarily given the best deal in terms of programming of their performances. Although in some cases festivals do lead to groups developing more longstanding partnerships with particular groups, it does not necessarily follow that groups involved in such festivals will engage in networks on a more ongoing basis.

Many groups are based in small local communities where there is a lot of other community activity happening. In these cases, even if the group itself has no formal connections with other groups in the area, it is not unusual for its members to be independently involved in a range of community activity. A painters group may have members who are also involved in local music or writers groups and are proactive in other community based activity such as churches or community associations.

5.7 Links with the professional sector

There is some concern that the sector has a tendency to fall between stools, both in terms of policy making and funding. Because it is arts focused it is often overlooked by the voluntary sector and because it is voluntary driven it is often undervalued by the arts sector. However, the sector is a very valuable part of the broader arts sector, or arts ecology as it is often described. Above and beyond playing a role in increasing participation and access for audiences, voluntary arts groups have other connections with the professional sector.

5.7.1 Progression from amateur to professional

Professional progression does not appear to be a significant motivation for participating in a group. Although there are instances in some groups of members having work published or selling pieces of their work, it is unlikely that they are able to earn a living from their artistic practice.

However, in the last five years 34% of groups have seen members progressing to become practising professionals in the artform. This varies between sub-sector; in theatre 52% of groups have seen members become professional, compared to 16% of dance groups. While the number of groups reporting progression to professional practice is high, the actual proportion of members making the progression is relatively low; the average across all groups is just 4% of current members. Dance demonstrates a much higher rate, with 9% of members becoming professional, compared to only 3% in theatre.

5.7.2 Employing professionals

Many groups hire the services of a professional to contribute to their group. This 'employment' could be a professional brought in on an ad-hoc basis or regular payment of a member. The following statistics refer to the latter. The level of paid members varies between artforms; in music, craft, festivals and visual arts 3% of members are paid to attend the group, in theatre 2% and in literature and dance 1%. Media is the least likely artform to employ the services of a professional with less than 1% of groups reporting such activity.

The survey found that across the sector 31% of expenditure was on employing professionals to work with the group, with music groups spending the most at 41%. Clearly, groups from across the sector see the opportunity to work with professionals as a valuable resource, inspiration and skills development opportunity for their members (see Table 14, page 47).

For some groups, particularly music and amateur theatre groups, professionals are employed on an ongoing basis. The contribution of the professional will clearly be specific to the artform, for instance choreographer, conductor or musical accompanist, and they will often take on the role of 'artistic director'. This professional input supports the groups in developing an artistic programme of activity which is both challenging and enjoyable for the members and draws in a broad and committed audience for the work.

It is important to recognise the difference between a professional employed by a voluntary arts group and similar activity in areas such as community arts. In the community arts sector the professionals are generally employed by an agency and their salary is often funded by an external grant maker. This means that although participants in the project are able to raise concerns if they are not happy with the performance of the professional, they are not in a position to cease the contract. In the voluntary and amateur arts sector, the professional is employed by the participants of the group through the management committee and their payment is primarily covered from the group's self-generated income. This means that the members of the group have the power to dismiss the professional if they feel they are no longer the most appropriate person for the role.

It is also common for professionals to be employed on an ad hoc basis, with groups bringing in professional artists to deliver workshops and masterclasses for their members or as speakers for events which might be open to a broader audience. Some of these groups highlighted that they sometimes find it difficult to find artists. Some said they found it difficult to access information on how to contact potential candidates and find people with the necessary experience of and interest in working with voluntary groups. Others found that the costs associated with hiring artists often limited their ability to do this on a regular basis with many artists and professionals expecting fees as well as expenses and subsistence, which although appropriate for the more resourced professional and community arts sector are often beyond the financial constraints of voluntary arts groups unless they are able secure additional funding.

5.7.3 Benefits for professionals

There are significant benefits for artists working with participation driven voluntary arts groups: "Involvement in arts activities can have a positive impact on the confidence, skills and training of the artists themselves."⁴ To gain an insight into the activities of professionals working with groups and the way in which they contribute, interviews were conducted with a small number of professionals working in the roles most commonly employed by groups – an accompanist, a choreographer, a visual artist and a conductor. Although one of the professionals interviewed is now retired, there was consensus that involvement in a voluntary arts group is complementary to a professional career. For example, one professional described their inclusion in a community-based voluntary and amateur group as an asset to their professional CV, because it helped to show prospective clients that they were experienced in a diverse range of areas related to their artform.

There are also some instances where professional or retired professional artists become members of voluntary arts groups. It seems that for these professionals this tends to be for personal benefit rather than part of their commercial practice and for retired professionals it provides an opportunity for them to continue sharing and maintaining their creative skills.

It is clear that professionals in voluntary and amateur groups find their involvement beneficial to their main occupations in a number of subtle but significant ways. This ranges from opportunities to explore new creative practices and new ways of working through to developing innate qualities such as 'people skills' and teaching ability. Involvement can also help to diversify professionals' experience and marketability in the context of their main occupation. There is evidence that more could be done to promote the opportunities and benefits of working with the voluntary arts sector amongst professional artists.

It became clear during this research project that the relationship between the amateur and professional sectors is crucial and that this relationship is changing, particularly with the development of new technology. The two sectors support one another and are inter-related in many complex ways. It has not been possible to explore this in detail in this study, and we recommend further research should be done to look into this rewarding area.

⁴ Use or ornament? The social impact of participation in the arts, Francois Matarasso, Comedia, 1997

6. Impacts

In 1997 Comedia published Francois Matarasso's influential study Use or Ornament? The social impact of participation in the arts. This study argued that although the debate regarding the economic impact of the arts, kick-started by John Myerscough's survey The Economic Impact of the Arts in Britain published by the Policy Studies Institute in 1988 was useful, it was perhaps limited and did not address the broader and deeper impact of participation in creative and artistic activity. Use or Ornament? highlighted that: "arts produces impacts as complex as the human beings who create and enjoy them."⁵

These studies on social and economic impact were hugely influential in starting the debate and discussion regarding the multi-faceted impact that the arts and creativity can have on both individuals and society as a whole, and there is now a significant body of literature which both advocates and attempts to provide evidence for this impact.

Although all of these studies are building a strong evidence base for and advocating the value of the arts, the focus has primarily been on making the case for public investment. As the voluntary arts sector is not a primary recipient of public sector funding, the specific role that the sector plays in relation to opportunities for participation is not generally covered in these publications. Equally, there is a tendency to focus on the instrumental rather than intrinsic value of the arts, when the focus of the majority of voluntary arts groups is to enable people to participate primarily in order to enjoy an artform.

The findings of this study begin to highlight the crucial role which voluntary and amateur arts groups play in the arts ecology. The sector is well placed to enable people to access creative activity and arguably can sometimes be in a position to fill gaps which other parts of the broader arts sector are not well placed to deliver. This suggests that those policy makers and support agencies which disregard or overlook the value of the sector are in danger of missing a significant opportunity.

Key messages:

- There is evidence of a significant demand for access to the arts and culture across the population and the voluntary arts sector plays a crucial role in supply and demand at a local level.
- The voluntary arts sector has been and will continue to be sustained through the time and financial commitment of its members, even in a society where there is huge competition for time and money.
- Participation in the arts and management of groups has a significant impact on individuals and the member-driven and managed nature of the voluntary arts has a significant (if secondary) impact on social inclusion, social capital and empowerment.
- Embedded in the grass roots of local communities, the voluntary arts sector has a deep, fundamental and complex impact on developing vibrant and inclusive communities.
- Driven by enjoyment and appreciation of the artform and with a focus on developing high quality activity and skills, the voluntary arts sector has a high artistic and creative value both in terms of sustaining cultural traditions and developing new artistic practice.

6.1 Demand for artistic and creative activity

There is now a significant body of evidence which demonstrates a huge demand for access to high quality arts and cultural activity throughout the population. The arts and culture in contemporary society is no longer an elite pastime enjoyed by a privileged minority: "The arts are a delight and enrichment to the lives of millions of people: that is why they participate, in countless ways, in countless places, on countless occasions."⁶

From October 2006 to September 2007 the Arts Council held its first public value inquiry, The Arts Debate. This exercise consulted a broad range of stakeholders, including members of the public, artists, arts managers and partner organisations, to ascertain the value people in England place on the arts. This major study found that: "The majority of people believe the arts can play an important role in the lives of individuals and society."⁷

The Taking Part survey commissioned by the DCMS collects data on the number of people engaging with arts and culture. According to the survey, 77% of all adults in England have taken part in the arts in the last 12 months. 66% of people attended arts events, 52% of people participated in an arts activity, and 43% did both. In its current form this survey cannot unpick the detail of how and where people participate in the arts.

However, the role that the voluntary and amateur arts sector plays in relation to participation has been clearly highlighted by this survey. It has found that a total of 9.4 million people participate in voluntary and amateur arts groups. On average 75% of groups who responded to the survey feel that their members join for enjoyment and appreciation of the artform. It is also important to recognise that the sector is primarily resourced by self-generated income. 15% of income comes from participants, for example through subscriptions and event fees and 49% from audiences through ticket income and similar activity.

In a society where there is a significant amount of competition for people's time and money, this level of personal and financial commitment is a huge asset for the sector and an indicator of its value. Crucially, the voluntary arts sector is a prime example of balancing supply and demand at a local level. This has enabled many groups to be sustainable over a long period of time, some for decades and even over 100 years, and indicates that the sector is highly valued by those directly participating in creative activity, by audiences and by the wider community.

6.2 The value of participation

Although it is recognised that culture as a whole is of significant value, Use or Ornament? focused specifically on the value of participation, particularly the social impact. It identified six key themes into which the social impact of participation could be divided:

- Personal development
- Social cohesion
- Community empowerment and self-determination
- Local image and identity
- Imagination and vision
- Health and well being⁸

Participation is the prime driver for the voluntary arts sector and participation at all levels is highly valued. From creative practice to group management to technical and practical support, voluntary and amateur arts groups are defined and driven by their members. In essence, for many people, being involved in voluntary arts activity is a key part of ensuring they have a good quality of life. It provides them with both an outlet for their creative talent and an opportunity to develop and build broader social networks.

⁶ Ibid

6.3 Social inclusion and social capital

As well as the creative element there is of course a strong desire to enjoy this creative development in a welcoming, sociable and supportive environment:

“... the desire for fun, relaxation or excitement; to escape the pressures or tedium of day-to-day working life; to experience something unusual or uplifting or surprising; and for the opportunity to learn something new. For many people the arts are a positive, happy but also challenging aspect of their lives. Participants described the social dimension as particularly important... associate the arts with friendship, spending time with the family and sharing an experience with others from all walks of life.”⁹

Groups did not define their value in language used by policy makers and community development practitioners with terms such as ‘social inclusion’ or ‘social capital’. However, analysis of responses to the survey and interviews with groups highlighted that for many people this social element is a vital part of engagement in a voluntary arts group. Although groups do not necessarily proactively recruit members from diverse communities, they nevertheless see themselves as open and inclusive and keen to encourage participation in the artform to anyone who wishes to do so.

Fundamental to the ethos of voluntary arts activity is providing a supportive and cooperative environment. This is an environment in which members are keen to both learn from other members and share their own skills and in which people feel a collaborative sense of individual and group achievement. This might be particularly important for the large number of retired members, for whom being involved in a group can often provide an opportunity to socialise, focus and attain personal development which would previously have been provided by the workplace.

A key part of social inclusion and building social capital is the concept of ‘empowerment’, enabling people to take control of their personal environment and giving them confidence that their voice will be heard. In his Use or ornament? research, Francois Matarasso found that groups where people felt most empowered “tended to prioritise active involvement in all levels of decision-making associated with the work, including administration and management”.¹⁰ By definition, voluntary and amateur arts groups are ‘governed or organised by those also participating in the activities’. This suggests that the recognition that self-empowerment is at the heart of their activity could provide some valuable lessons for policy makers, although care must be taken to guard against forcing voluntary and amateur arts groups into a role which would be contrary to their self-sufficient, arts-focused and membership-driven ethos.

6.4 Benefits to the community

It is recognised that arts and culture have a key role to play in regenerating communities. Key reports in this area include the 2004 report to the DCMS, The contribution of culture to regeneration in the UK: a review of evidence by London Metropolitan University,¹¹ which was closely followed by the DCMS publication Culture at the Heart of Regeneration. As with similar impact studies, these primarily focused on the impact of the publicly funded cultural sector, in particular the role that it plays in strategic regeneration initiatives and urban capital development.

Being developed from and embedded in the grass roots of local communities, the voluntary arts sector has a much deeper, fundamental and complex role to play in developing vibrant and inclusive communities, a role whose very nature is dependent on and embedded in local communities and cannot easily be replicated by top-down, policy-driven initiatives. As with social inclusion, although groups did not use policy terms such as ‘neighbourhood renewal’, they did refer to having a significant amount of good will and informal support from their local community, which suggests that these aspects are highly valued.

Voluntary arts can often provide access, both as participants and audience members, for people who would otherwise not consider engaging in the arts or have no access due to living in an area where there is low service provision. All groups aim to be inclusive and welcoming and are keen to enable as many like-minded people as possible to engage in the artform. Where there is not capacity in the group to take in new members, it is not unusual for groups to proactively support people to set up their own groups, thus ensuring that there is a range of opportunity for people throughout the community to get involved and providing a diverse range of creative opportunities.

Importantly, voluntary arts organisations play a key role in creating demand for and supporting local venues and community facilities. Community associations, community schools and religious buildings provide a core hub around which activity is generated for many small communities. Voluntary arts groups are a key part of the range of community activity which ensures that community buildings are financially and socially viable. It is also common for voluntary arts organisations to hold fundraising events to raise money which they donate to local charities.

Often it is the local communities' voluntary arts groups that are centrally involved in performing at and organising community festivals, fairs and events. Morris dancers will perform throughout the summer at local pubs, folk singers will perform at buskers nights and events, film clubs will run screenings of films for young people for whom attending a cinema requires significant travel and the local amateur dramatic society will organise the village's annual pantomime. This is particularly important in rural areas which often suffer from an under-provision of arts facilities. It is this activity which brings a vibrancy and life to communities, develops and keeps alive local cultural traditions and, probably most importantly, has local residents at its heart.

6.5 Impact on the economy

The economic impact of the voluntary arts sector is seen through direct financial measurements of income and expenditure, but in fact it needs to be considered much more broadly. The sector contributes to the economy indirectly through improved training and employment opportunities, local spending and involvement in regeneration programmes. A number of studies have been undertaken at local, sub-regional and regional level that explore these economic contributions and though each has approached the issue from a different perspective they provide a useful insight into the impact of the sector.

Creative Yorkshire's study¹² considers the sector's contribution to economic regeneration and argues that although the sector has been involved in development activity through regeneration programmes and closer links with public policy objectives, its direct involvement in delivering economic regeneration is very limited. In Yorkshire and Humber, the sector has been involved in the work of the Yorkshire and Humber Regional Forum. The Forum highlighted the difficulties in measuring the sector's economic contribution through "crude economic terms alone" arguing that "voluntary activity generally has a positive impact on the individuals involved and on society as a whole. Providing services for particular groups is often directly relevant to economic activity levels".

The Voluntary Arts Project for Cumbria¹³ provides an interesting perspective on the economic impact of voluntary arts at a community level, specifically the unpaid labour and time on which arts groups and projects rely. The study argues that one method by which economic value in this sector can be measured is by the number of hours of unpaid staffing recorded in an area – for Cumbria this figure was over 4,000 hours per week. There are 136 paid staff carrying out 450 hours' work per week. Annual expenditure on staffing in this area amounted to £194,000. Assuming that staff work for a standard 48 weeks per year, this equates to 21,600 hours at a cost of £194,000 or £8.98 per hour. If this hourly rate was applied to the 4,000 hours of unpaid staffing the cost would be £35,920 per week and £1.7m over a 48 week year.

The Valuing the Voluntary Arts research in Somerset and Dorset¹⁴ provides more detailed financial figures, demonstrating the direct and significant economic impact of the voluntary arts sector. The study showed that in Dorset, voluntary arts groups have an annual turnover of at least £2.6m and support the local economy by around £1.3m a year. In Somerset, voluntary arts groups have an annual turnover of over £4m and support the local economy by around £1.1m a year. The study's results also showed that the majority of sector expenditure in Dorset and Somerset is spent locally (55% and 62% respectively).

As shown in this study (section 4.3.2 (page 27)) the average turnover and expenditure of groups is extremely variable, with group income ranging from £1,600 (craft) to £27,200 (festivals). Table 11 (below) shows the estimated total turnover for voluntary and amateur groups across England by region and artform. In 2006/07 groups generated a total income of £543.6m.

Groups in the South East generated the most income overall (£100m), followed by the South West (£79m) and the East (£65m). Yorkshire & Humber, the North East and the East Midlands generated the lowest total turnovers, ranging between £41m and £46m. As may be expected given the high average turnover per group, theatre contributed the most turnover with £122m of the total. Music had the next highest total turnover, with £79m. Table 12 (below) shows the breakdown of total income from the various sources of funding and finance across the sector in 2006/07.

¹⁴ Voluntary Arts England (2004) Valuing the Voluntary Arts – The State of the Sector in Somerset and Dorset

Half of the income generated by groups came from ticket sales (or similar). This demonstrates not only the key role that audiences have in supporting the voluntary arts but also the extent to which the voluntary arts are accessed by the public, demonstrating a high level of demand at a local level. Arts Council Lottery Funding granted £31m to the sector in 2006/07, £10m more than was granted through Local Authorities.

Table 13 (below) considers the total expenditure of groups by region and artform in 2006/07. Overall, groups spent £406m across the year. Groups in the South East incurred the most expenditure at £72m, followed by the South West with £59m.

Theatre and music incurred the largest expenditure, £87m and £72m respectively. Craft and literature had the lowest total expenditure, £1.3m and £1.4m respectively. Table 14 (below) shows the breakdown of total expenditure on services/goods across the sector during 2006/07.

In 2006/07 voluntary and amateur arts groups spent £125m hiring professionals, £67m on venue hire and £58m on arts equipment and technical services. Securing the services of a professional is by far the largest expense for the sector and constitutes almost twice the spend on venues.

While it may well be the case, as noted by Creative Yorkshire, that the sector does not play a significant role in economic regeneration, the financial contribution that the voluntary and amateur sector makes to the arts sector and its supporting infrastructure cannot be overlooked. As groups are at the core of local communities, many for long and sustained periods of time, it is also important not to overlook the sometimes difficult to measure economic value in terms of groups buying and sustaining local services, from venues for rehearsals through to caterers for events.

6.6 Artistic and creative value

Although the voluntary arts sector clearly has invaluable social, community and economic impacts, it is important to recognise that these are perhaps secondary to the prime driver for the sector. 75% of groups feel that their members join for enjoyment and appreciation of the artform. Further analysis of narrative responses and interviews with representatives highlighted that people get involved in the voluntary arts because they are passionate about the particular artform and want to develop their own artistic practice. Although this is not necessarily associated with a desire to become a professional artist, it is very strongly associated with a sense of personal development, pride in achievement and the opportunity to share this creative practice with other people.

For some parts of the sector, particularly more traditional English artforms and crafts, it was also recognised that many groups have been established thanks to a desire to ensure that these traditional creative skills are not lost to future generations. It could be argued that as these artforms are not areas which are financially supported by the broader arts funding system, these groups play a crucial role in keeping cultural traditions and artforms alive.

Excellence and quality of artforms is at the heart of the sector and section 5 of this study considers the strong links between the amateur and professional sectors. It is therefore important to recognise the value of the sector as a core part of the broader arts ecology which is driven by creative practice, both in relation to keeping traditional artforms alive and developing new and innovative creative products.

7. Challenges and enablers

The following section details the various challenges and enablers to participation in, and the operation and maintenance of, a voluntary and amateur arts group.

Key messages:

- Access to good quality suitable venues at a reasonable cost is essential for voluntary arts groups and there are concerns that rising costs of venue hire for meetings, rehearsals and performances may result in a need to increase membership fees and ticket prices which could have a negative impact on membership levels and audience figures.
- Groups which manage or own their own venue face additional management and financial challenges particularly in relation to ensuring the upkeep of the building as a resource, not only for their group but for wider public benefit.
- 82% of the sector's income is self-generated but some groups are keen to access funding for new or additional activity and there are concerns that voluntary arts groups do not fall into the funding criteria of some programmes, that application processes can be complex and time-consuming and that often funding comes with strings attached.
- Attracting and retaining members and getting members of the group to volunteer for management and administrative tasks is crucial and can be a challenge for some groups.
- Planning and developing creative activity which is high quality, engaging and meets the needs of members is essential and is logistically complex and challenging.
- Bureaucracy and compliance with legislation is a key challenge for voluntary arts groups and can be restrictive of creative activity, with a sense that legislation has been developed in the context of the professional sector with limited understanding of capacity in volunteer run organisations.
- Some groups require access to specialised equipment, instruments and facilities.
- There is a misconception that the voluntary and amateur arts are low quality, which means groups are often overlooked by policy makers, funders and the broader arts sector.
- Press and improved publicity is crucial to raising the profile of the sector both for generating interest in individual groups and raising the profile and perception of the sector as a whole.

7.1 Venues

7.1.1 Cost of venues

Many groups have negotiated a reduced rate for the venue they use but it is recognised that venue providers are under increasing pressure to generate income from venue hire to cover the increasing costs of insurance, legal compliance and building maintenance. In some cases groups felt that the potential increases in rent could threaten the future existence of the group.

On average 23% of group expenditure is on venues, either for general meetings (7%) or performances (17%). This varies significantly by artform, as shown in Table 15 below.

Table 15: Proportion of expenditure on venues

As the voluntary arts sector is primarily supported through self-generated finance, there are particular challenges for the sector to balance the books. Any increase in venue costs has to be covered somehow. If this is through an increase in subscriptions and session fees, there is concern that this could result in a drop in membership which would make the group unviable. Equally, rising venue costs impacting on ticket prices could be off-putting for audiences, making it difficult for groups to finance good quality performances.

There was concern that in some areas voluntary groups are priced out of the market for the use of professional performance venues. It was felt that sometimes venues did not have a sliding scale of charges to meet the needs of a range of potential users from not-for-profit organisations through to, for example, bands that perform at venues generating commercial profit. This is a particular challenge in areas where there is a high demand for performance space. Equally, when booking larger scale performance venues, groups have to be confident that they are able to generate enough of an audience from the production run to cover the higher costs of venue hire.

7.1.2 Suitability and quality of venues

A large number of groups said that they had found it difficult to find venues in a good location that provided them with the range of facilities that they needed. Often the range and types of activity which groups undertake means that they require a broad range of facilities.

The size of space available is often important. Some groups find that their capacity to take on new members is constrained by the size of the venue which is available to them. On the flip side of this, others find that there are only extremely large venues in the area which means that their group is 'rattling around' in the venue. Although this is not insurmountable, it is not ideal for a positive experience of being involved in the group. There is a similar challenge when groups are sourcing performance venues. If they are too small there will be limits on the audience they can attract, but if they are too large they may be playing to a half-empty auditorium, which is never a positive experience for performers.

The need for storage space, particularly for groups which needed to store props, sets, instruments or uniforms, was also raised as an issue, as was the need for some groups, particularly media or craft groups, to have access to a range of specialist technical and practical space which is sometimes not available in the local area.

For most groups, the opportunity to socialise outside the practical participatory activity was also important. This means that finding a venue which has either a café or bar facility, or these facilities close by, is high on the list of venue requirements.

Crucial to any experience of the voluntary arts, be that as a participant or as an audience member, is the quality and upkeep of the venue which activity takes place in. It is important that venues are comfortable and warm and have clean, good quality facilities. In response to the survey some groups highlighted concerns that the buildings which they had access to were now starting to fall into a poor state of repair and although they were sensitive to the financial challenges which the building owners face and tried to be as supportive as possible, deterioration was a major concern. Although there is in reality no link, there is concern that a poor quality building might reflect on the perception of the quality of the voluntary arts group itself.

7.1.3 Venues owned by voluntary arts groups

An average of 6% of groups meet in a venue that is owned or managed by the group. This varies by artform; theatre groups are most likely to own or manage their own venue (13%), followed by craft (5%). Of the remaining artforms, 2-3% of groups own or manage their venue, with the exception of media, where ownership or management of a venue is a very rare occurrence.

The responsibility of running a building can place extra pressure on a group’s management. All voluntary arts groups who have responsibility for running buildings do so with a very strong commitment to providing a resource for public benefit. As such they take the responsibility for its upkeep and refurbishment, accessibility, insurance and compliance with legislation and licensing laws very seriously. All of this creates particular challenges in relation to management and finance. Crucially, groups need to ensure that they are generating enough income not only to cover the costs of running their activity but also to make enough of a surplus to plough back into the maintenance of the building. There are grants and funding streams which organisations can access for help with key refurbishments and developments, but there are very few which will support the ongoing maintenance and upkeep of buildings.

7.2 Finance

7.2.1 Self-sustaining

Across the sector 82% of finance is self-generated, though this varies by artform. 83-90% of finance in dance, music, visual art, and theatre is generated by the group compared to 44% in literature. Approximately 80% of craft and media finance is self-generated. Groups are very entrepreneurial about how they generate this income, with methods including subscriptions and activity fees, ticket income and selling programmes, running competitions which charge for entry, publishing and selling anthologies and fundraising through raffles and other charity events.

As shown in Table 16, 75% of groups generate finance through subscriptions/fees and 71% through ticket sales. Only 25% seek finance or sponsorship from local businesses and 13% generate finance through donations.

Table 16: Proportion of groups generating finance by method and artform

There is clearly a pride in this ability to generate finance. Interviews with representatives from voluntary arts groups highlighted that they felt this gave them an independence which ensured that the activity they deliver is always driven by the paying members of the group rather than dictated by the particular criteria or monitoring requirements of funders. That is not to say that groups do not access funding for project activity when they want to develop additional projects. However, it was remarked that once a group started accessing core funding for their activity there was a danger that this could make them reliant on one primary source of funding rather than spreading their income across a range of income streams, leading to financial vulnerability.

There were some concern, however, that being financially sustainable could go against a group if it did decide to apply for funding for developing new activity or holding one-off additional events.

7.2.2 Additional activity

Although groups are generally able to generate enough income to cover the ongoing running of their groups, their finances can often not stretch to more ambitious additional activity.

Many groups are keen to bring in professional speakers and demonstrators to add value to the skills sharing which exists within the group. It is strongly felt that this opportunity to engage and work with professional artists can be hugely inspirational and build members' confidence in their artistic ability and creativity. However, many groups find it difficult to source speakers who will provide their services at an affordable rate. This is often exacerbated if the professional also charges travel costs and accommodation on top of their fee.

It is also felt that occasional additional funding can enable groups to expand the scale of what they do and even open up access to the group sessions and performances to a wider public. Carrying out activity of this kind often requires significant additional costs including securing speakers who will be a big enough draw for a wider audience, hiring a larger, more expensive venue and in some cases (if these are not covered by the venue) having to cover the cost of additional insurance and licensing associated with public events.

Festivals and opportunities to perform will always be important for groups, and many groups highlighted that they would like to access funding to hold such events. Equally, many groups are involved in performing in festivals across the country and even internationally. This is seen as vital for the development of the groups, both in terms of raising their profile and in terms of skills development opportunities for their members. However, attending such festivals can be beyond the financial limitations of many groups. Travel and accommodation can be extremely expensive, particularly if events are overseas and if young people are involved, meaning chaperones are required to accompany them. This is a particular challenge for groups which work in more disadvantaged communities with people who are unlikely to be able to afford to cover the costs of their own travel.

7.2.3 Applying for funds

Although the majority of income for the sector is self-generated, some groups do access funding and some highlighted that they would be interested in accessing grants. As shown in Table 16, 4% of groups have received funding from the Arts Council, 5% from another Lottery distributor and 10% from trusts and foundations. The most commonly accessed is the Local Authority, with 18% of groups having sourced funding from their local council.

Table 17: Proportion of groups sourcing funding by artform

Artform	Arts Council Lottery Funding	Other Lottery Distributor (inc. Awards for All)	Trusts and Foundations	Local Authority
Craft	4%	4%	4%	7%
Dance	0%	2%	5%	8%
Festivals	14%	10%	20%	43%
Literature	14%	6%	6%	28%
Media	0%	3%	5%	10%

Visual Art	0%	2%	4%	8%
Average	4%	5%	10%	18%

Source: TBR Art Survey 2008 (Ref: W5/S4)

This is primarily for one-off projects such as events, exhibitions and festivals, for bringing in professional speakers and demonstrators, for purchasing kit, equipment and instruments or for specific communication initiatives such as website development, publishing anthologies or promotional literature. Although some groups are accessing funding it is also apparent that many groups have not previously considered this and were not even aware that they might be eligible for funding.

Across artforms only 16% of income is from a funding source. Again this varies across artform, with literature groups being the most likely to access funding (56% of income across the artform from funding). Dance and music source the least funding (10%). Between 20-25% of craft, festivals and media income is obtained through funding sources.

Concerns about accessing funding were raised by a large number of the groups who responded to the survey. In particular, there are concerns that in recent years there have been reductions in the levels of funding available and the grant schemes that do exist seem to focus on areas of disadvantage or on particular target communities. It was felt that this is particularly the case for Local Authority grant schemes. As voluntary and amateur arts groups are extremely successful in generating income and are often based in areas which are not considered disadvantaged, there is a perception amongst some groups that they are precluded from accessing funding. This is a real challenge for groups as they are often delivering high quality arts activity in areas which have very limited provision and for people who would otherwise not have easy access to participation in an artform. There was a suggestion that 'cultural' disadvantage is an equally worthy cause.

Some felt that funding application forms were often over-complicated and perhaps designed for arts organisations with professional staff, and that for groups that are purely voluntary, making applications is time consuming and frustrating. There is a sense that the questions asked in applications forms and criteria for investment are often not relevant to voluntary arts groups. Many groups also highlighted that they were reluctant to access grant funding as they felt that there were often strings attached which would dictate the activity that they deliver and require additional management to ensure they were complying with monitoring and evaluation requirements.

It is also important to recognise that many of the challenges highlighted in response to the survey may be down to misconceptions and a lack of knowledge of available funding rather than based on the reality of funding programmes. Not all funding has strings attached and complicated forms. Nonetheless, it is important to ensure that where funding is available it is accessible, appropriately light-touch and enables groups to achieve their ambitions. Support for fundraising, signposting, making the criteria and application processes clear and appropriate for voluntary arts groups and providing advice and support to complete the necessary paperwork would constitute essential support services for the sector.

Clearly, being able to access funding is a significant boost for many voluntary arts groups. There is a real sense in many cases of 'chicken and egg' where a group would like to expand or try new activity and need more members to achieve this, but cannot get the new members without expanding or adding new activity.

7.3 Management and membership challenges

7.3.1 Managing the group

As highlighted throughout this study, the success of voluntary arts groups is based on a huge commitment of time and expertise from a large number of volunteers. This means that one of the primary challenges for any group is finding the time and the volunteers to carry out management and administrative tasks which are essential to ensuring the group runs smoothly and efficiently.

Although a large number of groups felt that they did not have any problems getting people to volunteer for management committees and specific tasks, others found that it can be a struggle. There was a particular concern from many groups that they found it difficult to get younger adults to volunteer for management responsibilities. It was generally felt that this is due to work and family commitments that make it difficult for this age group to find the time. This means that responsibility for management sometimes falls to the older, retired members of the group.

Some respondents to the survey felt that there was a certain level of apathy amongst members of their group with many members coming along purely to get involved in the artistic, creative and social activity and not being prepared to take on more onerous and less enjoyable management tasks. For small groups with very little management, this is not an issue. However, for larger groups which often have more complex management needs this can be a real challenge, and existing committee members have to spend a lot of time promoting the importance of management roles in ensuring the group's continued existence.

The survey also highlighted concerns that the responsibility of being a committee member can be off-putting. Above and beyond the time commitment, a committee or board member is entrusted with ensuring that the group is run for the benefit of the members, including financial management and compliance with legal, insurance and health and safety requirements to ensure the appropriate protection of the members. Where a group owns or is responsible for managing a building, this responsibility is increased due to a commitment to ensuring their building is a resource not only for their group but for the wider community.

Being unable to recruit an adequate number of people to take on management tasks is a real challenge. It means that existing committee or management group members have to spend significant amounts of time not only on the administrative tasks but also working to get more management volunteers.

7.3.2 Attracting and retaining members

Voluntary arts groups rely on a healthy turnover of membership to ensure they stay vibrant and are sustainable. Although a good number of groups stated that they had no problems in this area, some found that attracting members was a real challenge. Even those which felt that this was not an issue for them at the moment were very aware that it was important for them to keep their eye on the ball in this area.

One issue which came through very strongly was the challenge of attracting younger members, particularly young adults, to get involved in the group. In some cases this was based on a concern that attracting this age group was important for ensuring that the group could continue. For others, the focus was more on the artform and ensuring that skills and interest in a particular craft is not lost to future generations. It is recognised that this age group is likely to have many other commitments – family, work or education – which makes it difficult for them to participate in voluntary arts activity.

It is also likely that this age group accesses arts activity in other ways. Some may be involved through university or academic activity, while others may not have the time to participate actively in an artform but will be attending theatres, galleries and other artistic events.

Retention of members is as important for groups as recruiting new ones and some groups found this the bigger challenge. Voluntary arts groups work hard to ensure that the services and activity which they are providing to their members is engaging and interesting and ensures a committed core membership over a period of time. This is a particular challenge for performing arts groups, where it is essential that their members commit to a structured rehearsal schedule leading up to a performance.

7.3.3 Developing and planning creative activity

Programming times and locations which are suitable and convenient for the majority of members is a key challenge and the logistics of running general activity should not be underestimated. "Herding cats" was the analogy used by one respondent to the survey.

Many groups overcome this by having set times and venues for their activity. However, if anything happens which disrupts this, somebody has to take responsibility for making alternative arrangements and ensuring that all members of the group are aware of any changes. When organising events there is a huge amount of logistical planning required to ensure that there is time for the group to prepare and that there are both time and people available for setting up and taking down any exhibition or sets and technical equipment. Groups also have to think about how their event links in with other activity in the area. In some cases it will be advantageous to run at the same time as other initiatives to support critical mass and generate higher attendance; in others it will be important to ensure that there is no diary clash to guard against competition for audiences.

Many groups said that they had to spend a significant amount of their time sourcing speakers, demonstrators and professional artists to support the activity of the group. For those who are well networked this is not an issue, but networks are not consistent across the sector. Some organisations have an effective database which enables groups to access local professionals, such as Making Music's Concert Promoters' Network, which exists to facilitate member societies' booking of professional artists. Resources like this are not available across the whole of the voluntary arts, so many groups have to spend a lot of time trying to find professionals and speakers. Many get so frustrated that they simply give up.

As well as timing, programming a diversity of activity to ensure that the majority of members remain engaged is a major challenge. For music groups which have some mix of skills but perform to a high standard, it can be a particular challenge to ensure that work is not too demanding for less experienced members and yet challenging enough for the experts in the group. Equally, there can sometimes be a clash between the type of work which different group members want to be engaged with. Older, more longstanding members of a group might enjoy a traditional repertoire while younger or new members of the group might want to try more contemporary work. It is down to those who are running the group to find ways of managing these potential conflicts.

The majority of groups are keen to have a diverse and interesting range of activity for their members. However, for many there is concern that the ambition to have a diverse programme can put significant pressure on those managing the group and there has to be a careful balance to ensure that the committee or management group is not overloaded. The quality of experience of the members and audiences is at the forefront for all groups, so it is important that a balance is maintained to ensure that an overload of management tasks is not detrimental to the quality of the group's activity. This is a particular challenge for those groups who struggle to get people to volunteer for management tasks.

7.3.4 Bureaucracy and legislation

One of the biggest management challenges for the majority of voluntary arts groups is increasing bureaucracy and the need to comply with legislation. This ranges from simply knowing what procedures or legislation the group should be complying with through to having a robust understanding of what that means for the group.

Child protection legislation was raised as a particular challenge for many groups. Although there is an appreciation of the need for child protection, there was concern that much of the legislation puts a significant burden onto groups and limits their potential to develop activity for children and young people. At a basic level, many groups are not aware of the detail of the legislation and do not know where they can get support and advice on the compliance processes they need to go through. The need for 'chaperones' also creates challenges. It requires a time (and sometimes financial) commitment from parents and families to attend sessions with their children. For many parents the opportunity for their children to take part in organised activity provides them with time on their own. In these cases it is likely that parents will choose to place their children in provision from professional or community services who have more capacity to engage with legislation.

Licensing and public entertainment legislation was also raised as a concern by many groups, particularly the more informal groups such as folk and morris dancing. There was concern that both within these groups and within the range of potential performance commissioners, there is not the necessary level of knowledge of the legislation. This means that legislation can be over-applied, which can mean a performance simply doesn't happen or does so in an unprofessional manner, putting the group and individuals within it in an extremely vulnerable position.

Much of this legislation has been developed with the professional world in mind, where there is more capacity to manage bureaucratic processes and systems. For voluntary groups this can be a serious burden and can place huge limitations on their ability and confidence to deliver and expand activity. However, it is important to recognise that this is not limited to the arts sector and has an impact on groups across the voluntary sector. It is also recognised that work has been carried out by national bodies such as Volunteering England to support organisations in understanding legislation. Their support and advice on legal and compliance issues is invaluable.

7.3.5 Access to kit, equipment and instruments

For some groups having limited access to specialist kit, equipment and instruments can seriously limit the range of work and activity which they are able to deliver. For media groups this might be access to production and editing equipment and facilities; for photography groups, particularly those who do not work in a digital format, this might be access to dark rooms and printing facilities, and for music groups such as brass bands it could be instruments and uniforms.

Some groups are finding creative ways of accessing some of the specialist facilities. Other groups are developing partnerships with specialist schools and Higher Education colleges which are becoming important points of access for up-to-date equipment that would otherwise be outside the financial scope of voluntary groups. It was also suggested that it would be interesting to explore better links with the professional sector. This could involve enabling groups to access kit from professional companies and facilities in 'down time', when it is not being used by the host organisation. There may also be opportunities to encourage professional arts organisations to donate their old kit to voluntary arts groups rather than discarding it when they invest in more up-to-date equipment.

Being able to provide access to instruments was raised by many music groups as a real challenge when it comes to attracting new members. This is a particular issue for groups working in less affluent areas or trying to attract younger members who may not be able to afford to purchase their own instruments. Many performance groups also require members to wear uniforms for their performances. For people who may not have been involved in musical performance for some time, there may also be some reluctance to invest in instruments or uniforms in case they find that they do not enjoy being involved in the group. It is felt that there are very few funding streams which enable groups to accumulate banks of instruments and uniforms which would allow them to loan potential new members instruments and uniforms free of charge.

7.4 Perceptions of the sector

7.4.1 Quality and excellence

A very strong message that came through the survey, the interviews with voluntary arts groups and interviews with support organisations was the feeling that voluntary and amateur arts is perceived, amongst the wider community, as low quality. This is totally at odds with the ambitions of groups whose members strive to develop their creative skills and take pride in the quality of their work.

There are a large number of groups which have a national and even international reputation for the quality of their work. This ranges from amateur orchestras performing at high profile international festivals and competitions through to writers groups running competitions and collating anthologies which attract submissions from around the world. Although this quality is often recognised within the sector it is generally not appreciated more broadly, particularly amongst policy makers and funding bodies and the broader arts sector.

Concern was expressed that the arts funding system does not recognise the value of the sector as a key opportunity for enabling people to participate in high quality activity, and it was also felt that the sector is equally overlooked by local government. Although many Local Authorities have arts and cultural strategies, the voluntary arts sector is generally not specifically recognised in these strategies. Equally, when organising festivals and events, there is concern that voluntary arts groups are overlooked in programming with preference given to professional, and more expensive, performance groups or workshop facilitators.

7.4.2 Traditional British artforms

The survey highlighted a major concern amongst groups who are involved in more traditional, particularly British, artforms and crafts. The concern is that their practice is overlooked as not being a true part of the arts sector. It was felt that often these practices are not valued and are even seen as the butt of jokes rather than taken seriously as contributors to the broad cultural heritage of the country requiring a high level of skill and expertise.

It was felt that there is often much more interest in contemporary artforms, for instance contemporary dance rather than folk dance and new media rather than painting. Equally, where there is a focus on the traditional, this tends to be directed towards the traditions of ethnic and refugee communities rather than traditional British artforms. It was felt that a group of people getting involved in morris dancing or even performing Gilbert and Sullivan is just as much about keeping in touch with their culture and heritage as an Asian dance or music group. There is an overriding sense that traditional British artforms may be seen as 'white middle-class' preoccupations, which overlooks their value in keeping traditions alive.

The perceptions of these artforms often mean that groups find it challenging to recruit new members, particularly younger people. It is recognised that there is less teaching of traditional artforms in schools, so there are fewer opportunities for young people and children to get involved in the activity. It is strongly felt that work needs to be done to change the profile of these sectors of the voluntary arts, as one respondent commented, the "flat cap" reputation of brass bands does nothing to attract young people.

7.5 Press and publicity

Clearly, press and publicity have a key role to play in raising the profile and changing perceptions – and dealing with misconceptions – of the sector. Local press and media organisations are crucial partners for many voluntary arts groups doing significant work to raise the profile of the activity within the local community through free publicity, low cost advertising and positive editorials. However, some groups find it difficult to get good press coverage at an affordable price. Many felt that they spent a disproportionate amount of money on advertising and press in comparison with the benefits to the group.

Press and publicity have an important role to play at many levels. They can be beneficial to individual groups, enabling the attraction of new members and audiences, but equally can have a much broader strategic impact. Good quality press and media coverage can go a long way to raising the profile of the voluntary arts as a whole. Stories are featured in the community sections of the press, highlighting the positive social value of the groups. However, stories rarely appear in coverage of arts activity, which tends to be dominated by listings, critiques and reviews of professional companies and activity. Providing opportunities for voluntary arts organisations to feature more in the arts coverage of local, regional and even national media will go a long way to raising the profile of the sector as a key aspect of high quality arts provision.

8. Opportunities for growth

People running groups are hugely entrepreneurial, highly committed to their artform and ready to rise to any challenge, hence the large number of sustainable groups which have been running for many years. Groups provide an extensive range of opportunities at a very local level to participate in and engage with the arts and for this reason alone it is important that the sector continues to thrive and develop. The research undertaken outlines a number of opportunities that could be explored further to promote the growth of the sector:

- The study has demonstrated that the availability of appropriate venues is a key issue for many groups. Both for practice and performance, groups often struggle to find space that is appropriate for their needs, well-maintained and affordable. Ensuring sustained availability of venues for groups would provide fundamental assistance in maintaining a high level of voluntary and amateur arts groups.
- It is clear from the research that the voluntary and amateur arts sector makes a significant contribution to the broader arts sector economically, socially and creatively. It is also clear that there is often a lack of awareness or recognition amongst supporting organisations of the value and quality of voluntary and amateur arts, and that engagement with the sector can therefore be limited. Improving the level of understanding of the value of voluntary and amateur arts for organisations and individuals would assist in maximising the impact and potential of amateur participation across the sector.
- The amateur arts sector is rarely a high priority in terms of policy and strategy. Therefore, although there are many valuable support organisations already engaging with the sector they often have limited resources and capacity to do so proactively. Organisations operating at a local level are in the best position to provide direct support and signposting to groups and influence local funding and policy, which can have an extremely positive impact on the sector. Supporting regional and sub-regional arts organisations to proactively engage with, evaluate and build a stronger knowledge of the sector would have a positive impact on strengthening its support infrastructure.
- Local Authority Arts Development Officers are an invaluable resource and important conduit for interaction with the sector. However, research has shown that officers are disparately engaged with the sector. Improving the resources available to Local Authority Arts Development Officers to enable further engagement would be extremely beneficial. In many cases the action required may simply be a case of raising awareness of the role of the amateur sector in the arts environment.
- Supporting engagement is not necessarily about increased investment; it may involve reviewing where investment is already being directed, particularly in arts development agencies/departments, and empowering these structures to engage more actively with the voluntary and amateur arts sector.
- Raising the profile and recognition of the value of the voluntary and amateur arts, particularly in relation to the quality of the work, is of vital importance. Many amateur arts constantly struggle against stereotypical views of low quality and a 'just for fun' stigma. However as observed in the study, the quality of work is often very high because the social aspect, together with collective enthusiasm for the artform, means that people are well motivated.

- A key motivating factor for many groups participating in traditional artforms and crafts is ensuring the continuation of the artform. The preservation of cultural heritage and promotion of traditional arts and crafts is also a priority for many of the umbrella and membership organisations or associations supporting participation in them. A key challenge for these groups is a perceived lack of recognition for traditional arts. This is perhaps a result of a lack of critical mass. It would be interesting to explore the development potential of an 'Endangered Arts' sub-group, whereby supporting organisations joined together to lobby on behalf of this element of the sector.
- It is clear from the research that groups are determinedly self-sufficient and most show little interest in becoming engaged in the funding process, particularly for ongoing core funding. It is also apparent that there is a general lack of awareness amongst groups about the funding available to them. However, there are some areas where assistance to alleviate financial pressure would be beneficial:
 - Groups often struggle to meet the fees of professionals to speak/demonstrate at meetings or assist in the artistic direction of groups. Establishing a scheme whereby the cost of hiring a professional is met by the group and another agency (or whereby the groups pays a proportion of the cost and the professional claims the remainder) would have a significant impact on the artistic range of groups. Given the benefits to professional development noted in the study, this may be something Arts Council England wishes to explore further.
 - Sourcing materials and equipment can also be an issue for groups, either because they are expensive or difficult to locate. One possible solution could be the establishing of a materials exchange, whereby professionals and businesses could donate unwanted materials and equipment to be purchased by voluntary and amateur groups at a discounted rate, e.g. if a company updates its equipment.
 - While it is clear that the sector operates on a significant amount of self-generated income, funding can help groups take risks with artistic activity or hold larger scale events which can be open to a broader range of people. Identifying ways in which funding can 'add value' to the activity that is being carried out in the sector could therefore increase the range and diversity of voluntary and amateur activity.
- The study highlighted a number of links between the professional and amateur sectors. Further research with professionals working with amateur arts groups and those who have progressed to professional practice following involvement with a group would provide an invaluable insight into the developmental benefits of participation in the voluntary and amateur sector.
- It would be interesting to explore the potential for links between Higher Education Institutes (HEIs) and voluntary and amateur groups, particularly in terms of sourcing tutors/demonstrators for groups. Brokering a relationship with local HEIs whereby Masters students, particularly PGCE students, demonstrate to groups or teach sessions could be hugely beneficial for both group development and the individual development of the student.
- The research identified relatively low participation in the sector by people from BME groups. It was also noted that low rates of ethnic minority participation could potentially be attributed to a lack of identification with the term 'voluntary and amateur arts', particularly where groups operate around faith or worship. A valuable insight into the balance of professional, community and voluntary and amateur participation would be gained through research focusing on arts participation in BME communities.
- In order to maintain a flow of information about the voluntary arts and support the sector's development consideration should be made for a regular monitoring survey of the sector. The sector benefits from extensive good will toward engagement with this kind of research; 84% of participants in this study were happy to participate in further research. Alongside a periodical review, it would be interesting to develop a 'panel survey' whereby a number of groups are tracked regularly. This would provide a deep understanding of the life cycle of groups and the internal and external factors impacting on development.

- To allow for swift monitoring of a sample of the voluntary and amateur sector, umbrella bodies should be encouraged and supported to collect a standard set of basic information about members upon joining and renewing membership. This could be fed back to a central source and provide a ready bank of information on the sector.

9. Creative adult learning

The key objective of this element of the report is to provide an understanding of the size and scope of Adult Community Learning (ACL) in the creative sector from the perspective of providers and learners. This involves considering the infrastructure supporting adult learning as well as those taking part and understanding reasons for and barriers to participation.

While a substantial amount of information is available on arts engagement and adult learning as separate entities, this document aims to bring together information on adult learning and arts engagement, provide detail on the number of adults participating in creative adult learning and understand their motivations and experiences.

Key messages:

- A vast number of organisations and institutions are engaged in the delivery of creative adult learning: 4,560 providers falling into three main categories of further education, private classes and public community education.
- The 36,800 creative adult learning courses are available across England. Two-thirds of these courses are offered in craft and visual art subjects and less than 10% of the total offering is in Northern England (North East and North West).
- The majority of courses are offered over a period of 4 to 12 weeks and generally offered Monday-Thursday. Less than a quarter of courses are available over the weekend.
- An average of 96% of adults participating in creative courses are satisfied with their learning experience, rating delivery organisations and tutors above average on their knowledge of the subject and ability to understand learners. Areas where learners felt provision could be improved included the quality and availability of teaching materials and setting goals and targets to assist improvement.
- Between 2003/04 and 2006/07 1.9 million adults enrolled on a non-qualification related creative course funded by the LSC. The most popular courses tend to be arts, media and publishing, with 43% of learners taking courses in this category.
- The majority of learners are located in the South East and London. Of the other regions most learners are in the North West. 85% of people enrolling on courses are of white ethnicity, 77% are female and 36% are over 60.
- Learners tend to participate in courses for enjoyment and personal satisfaction. However, there are a number of individual motivating factors such as a desire to develop skills, desire to test skills before progressing to further study or potentially professional activity, relaxation and escapism or simply something to do in spare time. Post-completion learners are inspired to engage further with the arts and show an interest in or actively seek to take part in other arts activities.
- The key barrier identified was cost. While subsidies are available for certain groups, the initial outlay for tuition combined with often expensive materials can be off-putting, particularly if the individual is unsure that they will enjoy the course.

The following section presents an analysis of the provision of and participation in non-accredited courses available across England and considers learner perceptions of provision.

The section presents a range of information from the National Learning Directory, a government database of almost 1 million learning opportunities. It also presents information from the LSC’s Individualised Learner Record (ILR) for Adult and Community Learning, in order to provide an insight into the level of participation in adult learning across England. The ILR is a rich data resource built on information obtained from learners participating in LSC funded adult learning across the nation. It is recognised that participation in private courses is a significant element of total participation that is not captured by this dataset. However, given the scale of funded adult learning and the high levels of public provision it is felt that the statistics will be indicative of the likely trends within private provision and the profile of participants. It is also expected that the forthcoming DIUS consultation on informal adult learning and the LSC’s review of PCDL provision will provide some illumination on levels of private participation.

It should be noted that owing to differences in reporting information in the two datasets, information on participation is presented in artform groups that differ to those used for participation. For example the LSC reports data on ‘performing arts’ rather than breaking this down into artforms such as music, dance and theatre.

9.1 Levels of provision

- There are 36,800 adult learning courses in creative subjects available across England.

- 24% of all courses (8,900) are offered in London and 17% (6,400) in the South East. The North West and North East have the lowest levels of provision, with 5% and 3% of courses respectively (2,000 and 1,300).
- 33% of all courses (12,000) available are in craft and 31% (11,200) are in visual arts subjects. Literature and theatre have the fewest courses with 6% (2,200) and 3% (900) respectively.
- The majority of courses available (45%) run for between four and 12 weeks, though this varies across artforms. One day courses are most likely to be offered in literature and media (30% and 24% respectively).
- The most popular day of the week for courses to run is Wednesday. 69% of courses are offered Monday-Thursday, while only 20% are available over the weekend.

Table 19 shows the courses available per 10,000 adults in England and across the English regions. On average there are 8.8 creative non-qualification related courses for every 10,000 residents across the nation. As shown below this can vary significantly between artforms and regions.

The highest levels of opportunity per head are in London, the South East and Yorkshire and Humber; the proportion per head is above the national average. Interestingly, although the North East has the lowest level of provision (3% of all courses), the opportunity per head is on a par with the East and West Midlands. The North West has the lowest level of courses per head with only 3.6 per 10,000 people. Across all artforms the availability of courses per head in London is above the national average, particularly dance where there are more than twice as many courses compared to England.

- After London and the South East, theatre and performance courses are quite evenly spread across other English regions, ranging from 7% in both the South West and West Midlands to 4% in the East Midlands.
- The largest proportion of theatre courses available are in acting, which constitutes 49% of theatre performance courses across England. Carnival courses make up 9% of courses, followed by production with 6% and circus art with 5%.
- Availability differs across regions. In London acting courses constitute 57% of those available in theatre. The West Midlands has the largest proportion of carnival courses (29% of learning opportunities).
- The highest percentage of theatre courses (38%) run for between four and 12 weeks. Again this varies by region; in Yorkshire & Humber 67% of courses run for this period. The North West offers a substantially higher number of one-day theatre courses than other regions, with 27% of the courses available in the region taking this format. Across England relatively few theatre courses (7%) run for between one and four weeks. The North East offers the most variation in duration with 65% of courses being available at different durations.
- Across England, the highest proportion of theatre courses are run on Tuesday or Saturday (16% each). The rest of the courses are all relatively evenly spread out across the other days of the week, with the lowest number of courses (13%) being offered on Monday.

Distribution of visual art courses across England

9.1.7 Visual Art

- There are 11,200 non-accredited visual art courses available across England.
- Visual art courses constitute approximately a third (31%) of all creative adult learning courses available.
- After London and the South East, the largest proportion of visual art courses are offered in the South West (12%) and the East (10%).
- The majority of visual art courses available are in painting, drawing, printmaking or sculpture, which constitutes 68% of courses across England. Art appreciation and art history courses make up 17% of courses, followed by design with 5%.
- Availability differs across regions. In the West Midlands, painting, drawing, printmaking or sculpture courses constitute 76% of those available in visual art. The North West has the largest proportion of art appreciation and art history courses (24% of learning opportunities).
- Half of all visual art courses run for between four and 12 weeks. Again this varies by region; in Yorkshire & Humber 60% of courses run for this period. The East Midlands offers a substantially higher number of one-day courses than other regions, with 20% of the courses available in the region taking this format. Across England relatively few visual art courses (4%) run for between one and four weeks. Yorkshire & Humber offers the most variation in duration with 24% of courses being available at different durations.
- Across England, the highest proportion of visual art courses are run on Wednesday (19%), followed by Tuesday (18%). Only 6% of courses are run on Sunday, although in the West Midlands 14% of visual art courses are run on this day of the week.

9.2 Levels of participation

- Between 2003/04 and 2006/07 there were 1,932,600 enrolments on LSC funded adult learning courses with no qualifications in the creative sector across the whole of England. As shown in Table 20 below, the number of enrolments has decreased over the last four years. Following these trends it will continue to decrease over 2007/08 and 2008/09.

Table 20: Enrolments 2003/04 – 2008/09

Year	2003/04	2004/05	2005/06	2006/07	Total	Prediction 2007/08	Prediction 2008/09

- The largest proportion of enrolments are in arts, media and publishing courses (43%), followed by crafts, creative arts and design (26%), languages, literature and culture (21%), performing arts (8%), and media and communication (1%).
- The largest proportion of total enrolments are in the South East (21%), followed by London (18%) and the North West (12%). Only 4% of total enrolments were in the North East.
- The majority of course enrolments are female (77%), a pattern which is followed across all English regions.
- Just over half of all enrolments are in the 25-59 year age range, followed by 36% in the 60 and over group. There are very few younger enrolments on courses with no qualifications; in total only 5% of enrolments are for people aged 24 or under.
- 85% of all enrolments are of white ethnicity, followed by 3% Asian or Asian British ethnicity and 2% Black or Black British ethnicity. Less than 1% of enrolments are Chinese or Mixed ethnicities. Outside of London, these ethnicity patterns are quite similar, with the exception of the North West where 4% of all enrolments are Asian or Asian British ethnicity and the East Midlands where 2% of all enrolments are Asian or Asian British ethnicity.

9.2.1 Arts, media and publishing

- Between 2003/04 and 2006/07 there were 846,100 enrolments on arts, media and publishing courses across England. This constitutes 43% of all creative enrolments.
- The largest proportion of arts media and publishing enrolments (20%) are in the South East. Only 4% of these enrolments are in the North East.
- The majority of arts, media and publishing enrolments are female (80%). This varies very little across regions.
- The majority of arts, media and publishing enrolments (53%) are aged between 25 and 59. This varies between 47% in the North East and 58% in London. There is also a relatively high number of enrolments (39%) aged 60 and over. Only 5% of enrolments are aged 24 or under.
- The majority of enrolments are of white ethnicity (85%). This is followed by Asian or Asian British at 3%. The ethnicity was unknown for 8% of enrolments. Only 0.47% of arts, media and publishing enrolments were Chinese. Ethnicity patterns for enrolments follow a similar pattern across all English regions, although after London, the North West has the highest proportion of Asian and Asian British enrolments (4%).

9.2.2 Crafts, creative arts and design

- The largest proportion of crafts, creative arts and design enrolments are in the South East (20%), followed by London (18%) and the North West (13%). Only 5% of these enrolments are in the North East.
- The majority of crafts, creative arts and design enrolments are female (82%). This varies very little across regions.
- The majority of crafts, creative arts and design enrolments (51%) are aged between 25 and 59. This varies between 46% in the North East and 59% in London. There is also a relatively high number of enrolments (43%) aged 60 and over. Less than 4% of enrolments are 24 or under.

- The majority of languages, literature and culture course enrolments (62%) are aged between 25 and 59. This varies between 49% in the North West and 67% in London and the East Midlands. There is also a relatively high number of enrolments (29%) aged 60 and over. Less than 4% of enrolments are 24 or under. Although only 4% of enrolments fall into the 21 to 24 age category, this is higher than for enrolments in other sectors.
- The majority of enrolments are of white ethnicity (86%). This is followed by Asian or Asian British enrolments at 3%. Only 0.02% of enrolments are Chinese. Ethnicity patterns for enrolments follow a similar pattern across all English regions, although after London, the West Midlands has the highest proportion of Asian and Asian British and Black and Black British enrolments (5% and 2% respectively).

Similarly to languages, literature and culture courses, 4% of enrolments fall into the 21 to 24 age category.
- The majority of enrolments are of white ethnicity (84%). This is followed by Mixed ethnicity at 10%, Black or Black British ethnicity at 4% and Asian or Asian British ethnicity at 3%. Patterns appear to be quite different for this sector than for other sectors analysed. However, there is still a very small minority of Chinese enrolments (0.36%). Ethnicity patterns for enrolments follow a similar pattern across all English regions, with the highest proportion of mixed ethnicity enrolments being 22% in London.

9.2.5 Performing arts

- Between 2003/04 and 2006/07 there were 149,100 enrolments on performing arts courses across England. This constitutes 8% of all creative enrolments.

There was also a relatively high number of enrolments (25%) aged 60 and over. Less than 4% of enrolments are 24 or under. Similarly to languages, literature and culture and media and communication courses, 4% of enrolments fall into the 21 to 24 age category.
- The majority of enrolments are of white ethnicity (82%). This is followed by Black or Black British ethnicity (4%) and Asian or Asian British ethnicity (4%). Ethnicity patterns for enrolments follow a similar pattern across all English regions, with the highest proportion of Asian and Asian British and Black and Black British enrolments in London (9% and 13% respectively).

9.3 Quality of provision

The LSC carries out and publishes the National Learner Satisfaction Survey (NLSS) every year. The 2006/07 report is not available until spring/summer 2008, and the survey was not conducted in 2005/06¹⁵ therefore this review covers the 2004/05 report.

The NLSS is the largest survey of post-16 learners undertaken in England. It provides an overview of delivery and learner satisfaction levels with education and training in England among learners aged 16 and over by capturing their views on various aspects of their learning. This provides invaluable insight into learners' perceptions of what is already working well and what might be improved. The survey also allows for an analysis of key sub-groups within the learner base, such as younger learners, learners from minority ethnic backgrounds and learners with learning difficulties and disabilities.

The objective of the NLSS is to provide an overview of 'delivery and learner satisfaction levels with education and training in England among learners aged 16 and over'. The adult learning sub-report focuses upon overall satisfaction and the quality of teaching in adult learning, both in non-accredited learning and in FE delivered by adult learning providers. The 2004/05 NLSS findings were obtained through consultation with 43,671 interviewees, of which 3,770 (9%) were people taking part in Adult and Community Learning.

¹⁵ When it was suspended to test whether or not it was fit for purpose.

The 2004/05 NLSS reported that overall satisfaction levels of adult learners across all learning areas were the highest they had ever been:

- In the 'non-accredited Adult and Community Learning (ACL)' group 94% expressed overall satisfaction with their learning experience (33% extremely satisfied, 41% very satisfied and 19% fairly satisfied).
- In the 'FE delivered by adult learning providers' group, levels of satisfaction with the overall learning experience were similar, with 93% expressing satisfaction.

In addition:

- Overall satisfaction levels have increased year-on-year in ACL as a whole.
- Learners from BME backgrounds were less satisfied than white learners. 27% of BME learners were 'extremely' satisfied with their overall learning experience, compared with 40% of white learners.
- In general, female learners and older learners were considerably more satisfied than male learners and younger learners.

9.3.1 Quality in creative adult learning

Of the 3,770 ACL participants interviewed for the NLSS ACL sub-report, 199 (5%) studied performing arts and media-based subjects or courses including drama, dance and photography.

- 96% of ACL learners participating in performing arts and media-based subjects were satisfied with their overall learning experience. This rating is slightly higher than the 94% of ACL learners across all subject areas expressing satisfaction.
- 96% of performing arts and media ACL learners expressed satisfaction with the quality of teaching they received. Again, this was slightly higher than the 94% average level of satisfaction with the quality of teaching across all subject areas.

As part of the NLSS research process, respondents are asked to provide feedback on satisfaction with aspects of teaching/tuition. Opinions are rated on a 1-10 scale, where a response of 9 or 10 is considered to indicate a positive appraisal.

Table 21 shows a comparison of teaching satisfaction scores provided by learners involved in performing arts and media and ACL learners overall. At a glance it is clear that performing arts and media ACL learners rate tutors particularly highly on their knowledge of the subject (5% above the average) and their ability to make the subject interesting and enjoyable (8% above average). Their ability to understand learners and how they like to learn, as well as their management of groups of learners, were also rated highly.

In contrast, performing arts and media ACL respondents rated teachers as lower than average on the support they provided, lesson planning, the quality and availability of teaching materials they used, and their provision of feedback. In particular, the quality and availability of teaching materials was poorly rated, with a positive score rating of 43% compared to the 51% average.

9.4 The experiences of learners

In order to gain an insight into the experiences of learners participating in creative adult learning, a number of in-depth interviews were carried out with current and lapsed learners. Learners participating in a variety of artforms were consulted, including poetry, creative writing, a variety of styles of dance, painting, pottery, glass jewellery making, photography and design.

9.4.1 Time spent participating in creative arts learning

The range of timescales spent participating in courses were extremely variable ranging from one day up to one year. Some courses had no fixed timescales and were ongoing. A small proportion of participants consulted for this study took part in 10-week termly courses and most of the respondents had been doing a variety of courses on and off for two years or more. This variation in participation reflects the varying duration of courses available.

9.4.2 Identifying courses

The internet was a common method of identifying available courses, along with a number of formal and informal avenues including local college and council prospectuses, advertising, local press, social networks and parents attending in support of their children. Public provision appears to be more visible within the community. The learners consulted in the study tended to source courses from public providers such as local colleges and through Local Authorities, though a few did go to privately run courses. The learners appeared to be very focused on their objectives and showed determination in finding suitable courses.

Messages were mixed from learners with regard to choice; some felt that provision had remained the same in recent years while others felt it had decreased. None felt that the range of provision in the area had increased. The changes described by learners reflected the focus on Skills for Life, with more courses focusing on basic skills.

9.4.3 Motivations for participation and desired outcomes

Learners participated for a variety of individual reasons. Overall, the main motivating factor was enjoyment and personal satisfaction. This was followed by the desire to develop new skills, relaxation, the desire to be attain a more 'professional' skill level and the inclination to practise an artform with the later goal of entering professional fields (i.e. getting work published, commissioning paintings, widening horizons and cultural awareness and providing goals to work towards).

There were often more specific reasons, such as to support professional employment/development, to go on to teach others or to set up an art group. There was little interest in gaining formal accreditation through learning activities; rather there was a preference to engage in informal learning that did not require a set number of extra hours or adhere to a formal attainment structure.

After completion, learners were inspired to continue participating in the arts, either showing interest in or actively seeking (or having already signed up to) another course or art group. Learners who were not currently participating had stopped doing so either because of prohibitive costs, other demands on time or not being able to find a suitable course in terms of artform or location.

9.4.4 Barriers to participation

Cost was the most frequently cited barrier to participation. This was not always related to course fees (though many learners found that subsidies were essential in order to support individuals who struggled to afford fees) but often to the cost of materials necessary for many artforms. A secondary cost barrier can be paying fees in advance for a full term of classes. This is particularly an issue if people are 'trying something out' and are unsure if they will stay the course. Where learners had participated in a number of courses across a long time period it was noted that increased costs could cause 'a downward spiral' as fewer people could afford the class, numbers would drop and the class would be cancelled.

Additional barriers included:

- Access – finding a suitable course in terms of artform, teaching ability and availability in terms of timing, location and/or course existence.
- Restriction on personal time.
- Lack of confidence – important in the context of attending a class with new people and concern that standards could be set too high.
- Teaching standards – knowledge that teachers do not need a qualification to establish a private class creating uncertainties about quality.

Learners proposed a number of solutions to the barriers identified. These included:

- Graduated payments – providers could develop a scheme to pay monthly or weekly (not termly), but still fully commit to all courses from the start. The possibility of developing adult education vouchers was also suggested.
- Holding taster sessions.
- Testimonials from previous students.
- Increasing advertising and/or developing a central information point.
- Allowing prospective learners to try out shorter courses with friends, so they can build up the confidence to commit to longer courses.
- Providing clear information on course requirements such as skill levels.
- Introducing a standard evaluation of tutors or asking the more established ones to remain in creative arts ACL.

10. Adult learning infrastructure

In order to provide an overview of the infrastructure supporting the delivery of creative adult learning, the map below has been developed in order to represent the structure of the sector in England, according to broad classifications of:

- education and learning activity
- arts and culture
- advisory and research bodies

The diagram on pages 80 and 81 represents the major funding streams and cooperative relationships that support the sector. Organisations are ordered in approximate hierarchy from top to bottom depending upon whether they are primarily disseminators or recipients of funding. In addition, each is colour coded according to their direct association with creative adult learning. The remainder of this section then describes the different activities and remits of the organisations represented on the map.

Organisations and institutions engaged in education and learning provision represent the most visible aspect of creative adult learning infrastructure in England. As funding is most commonly sourced through public sector provision, the funding sources and mediating organisations that support their delivery play a crucial role. However, providers situated within the arts and cultural sector tend to rely more heavily upon non-governmental sources of funding. Arts Council England serves as a key funding body for a number of RFOs providing learning opportunities in the arts. In 2006/07, 787 RFOs provided 'education and/or training programme(s)'. In total 3.6 million people attended informal education sessions, including approximately 680,000 adults.¹⁶

Local Authorities (LAs) play a key role in planning the range of provision to be delivered in a local area, coordinating adult learning opportunities through a range of local organisations. Local Strategic Partnerships (LSPs) between LAs, local delivery organisations (e.g. colleges, museums, libraries, schools) and partners are important vehicles for this process.

Educational co-operatives are important mediating influences within creative ACL. They have been included under 'Education and Learning' because they tend to offer arts-based learning as part of a wider programme, and deliver learning opportunities directly. Examples include the Adult Residential Colleges Association (ARCA), the Workers' Educational Association (WEA), and the University of the Third Age (U3A).

Voluntary and community sector (VCS) organisations – including but not limited to charities – also provide extensive adult learning provision across England, and are classed as mediating organisations here as they tend to direct provision across multiple local branches. VCS organisations maintain philanthropic ideals and provide learning for the purposes of personal enjoyment, leisure or recreation. Some adopt an explicit emphasis on the wider social benefits of inclusive ACL, such as ContinYou and the Development Education Association. As a rough approximation, the Charities Commission lists nearly 400 registered charities covering arts-related activities.

Additionally there are a number of advisory and research bodies that provide invaluable support to the sector, such as:

¹⁶ ACE Education Learning Participation 06/07. (Adults aged 20+).

- The National Institute of Adult Continuing Education (NIACE) which 'exists to encourage more and different adults to engage in learning of all kinds',¹⁷ and therefore serves as an important promotional, advisory and research body for adult learning, including creative ACL.
- A range of governmental and non-governmental think tanks which serve to influence learning provision across England. Examples include the Institute for Public Policy Research (IPPR), the Adam Smith Institute and the Social Market Foundation.
- Voluntary Arts England (VAE) is one of relatively few examples of an arts-centred advisory/research body, aiming to 'work towards an empowered, participative, fulfilled and healthy civil society by promoting practical participation in the arts and crafts'.¹⁸

10.1 Funding for adult learning

The majority of mainstream adult learning provision is funded through allocations to the Learning and Skills Council (LSC) from the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills (DIUS). DIUS' overall vision for adult education is of a service in which people from all backgrounds can participate, with access for all but with a focus on attracting people who have benefited least from such learning in the past.

The DCMS also works nationally through non-departmental public bodies such as the Arts Council, English Heritage and Sport England, who in turn support a range of specifically creative and cultural adult learning opportunities through Regularly Funded Organisations.

The LSC aims to provide a balance and mix of provision that takes into account the full range of provision available in a particular area and within institutions. This includes ensuring the continued availability of a wide range of adult learning opportunities for personal and community development learning (PCDL). While a tighter focus on key priorities in adult learning has resulted in more provision delivered at full cost (and therefore significant increases in fees) there remains a safeguarded level of PCDL funding of £210m per year. This 'safeguard' will be provided until 2010/11 in order to support a range of adult learning opportunities for personal development, cultural enrichment, intellectual or creative stimulation and enjoyment and community development learning. In its current format the £210m is broken down as follows:

- £153m for leisure and community related learning for personal and community development
- £20m for neighbourhood learning in deprived communities
- £25m for family, literacy, language and numeracy
- £12m for wider family learning.

The safeguard is delivered mainly through Local Authorities and also FE colleges but also through course subsidy, i.e. direct support to organisers of informal adult education, or through funding to individuals/groups to enable them to design and purchase their own informal education.

10.1.1 Distribution of funding across England

In order to provide an understanding of the changing distribution of funding across the nation information was obtained from the LSC on funding allocations to Local Authorities, which constitute approximately £120m of the £153m available for PCDL. The information was then aggregated to a regional level to provide an overview that would allow for a comparison across England. Information has been combined with data on resident population levels in order to provide a figure for the average funding per resident in each region.

Table 22 shows that overall there was a increase of 0.5% in funding allocated to Local Authorities over the period 2006/07-2007/08. This did vary significantly across the regions, with the South West receiving 14% less funding and Yorkshire & Humber 8% less. Funding in the South East, London and North East remained fairly static, while the North West and East regions saw increases of 11% and 8% respectively.

In terms of the distribution of funding across regions, London authorities receive the highest sum with 20% of all funding, followed by the South East and North West each receiving 15%. The North East and Yorkshire & Humber receive the lowest proportions with 4% and 7% respectively. Looking at this in comparison with resident population figures reveals an average figure of £3 of funding per adult resident across England. This varies significantly across regions from £4.12 per adult in London to £1.96 per adult in Yorkshire & Humber. Only the North West and London receive a higher than average level of funding per resident.

10.1.2 The impact of LSC funding changes

The National Institute of Adult Continuing Education (NIACE) provides an outline of the most significant impacts of LSC adult learning funding reductions in its 2007 Unison report, Understanding the impact of funding changes on adult learning. NIACE conducted interviews with 18 colleges and 15 Local Authorities. The most significant headline findings include:

- Early evidence of a reduction in the numbers of older participants in ACL.
- The loss of outreach centres and the 'dismantling of some of the adult curriculum' is likely to make it increasingly difficult to engage with learners in the near future.
- Skills for Life is becoming an increasing important delivery focus for LAs.
- Most providers have had to reduce staff numbers as a result of funding reduction for ACL.
- Local Authorities anticipate that major reorganisation will be necessary as a result of projected LSC funding cuts between 5% and 25%.
- On a positive note, providers are becoming more efficient and target-driven as a result of the pressure to reduce unnecessary expenditure.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly in the context of ACL in the creative arts:

- "There is evidence of a reduction in both the overall offer and the numbers of courses in certain traditional adult curriculum areas, for example arts and crafts..."

10.2 Delivering adult learning

Table 23 shows that there are currently 4,560 providers offering non-accredited creative learning courses across England.

NB Rows do not total horizontally because providers often offer more than one type of course.

The South East has the most providers, with more than three times as many located in this region as in the North East. London also has a high number of providers, which generally offer a more varied range of courses. Visual arts and craft have the most providers offering courses, with 2,430 and 2,100 respectively. Yorkshire & Humber has a much larger proportion of providers who offer courses in literature, media and music compared with other areas; its offering is similar to that of London and the South East.

An extensive range of partners are engaged in the delivery of adult education:

- Schools
- Further Education (FE) colleges
- Higher Education (HEIs) Institutions
- Private class-based providers
- Private self-study courses (with delivery supported through a public/private provider)
- Public Sector Community Education
- Voluntary Sector Education.

The majority of non-qualification creative courses are delivered through public sector community education (35%), Further Education providers (28%) and private class-based providers (21%). Given that private providers account for only 15% of the 4,560 providers, it is interesting that so much provision comes from this source.

As may be expected, without the constraints of following an agenda set by government priorities, private providers consulted tended to develop the range of provision in order to follow market demand, placing the emphasis on individual development. Conversely, public providers tended to place higher emphasis on harnessing the strength of local communities. In terms of developing the teaching and learning process, private providers appeared less thorough at gathering feedback from learners at the end of courses.

10.3 The impacts of adult learning

A number of key supporting organisations were consulted in order to gain an insight into the impact of adult learning. Interviewees included Heads of Adult Learning in a number of Local Authorities, representatives from the Department for Innovation, Universities and Skills (DIUS), Voluntary Arts England (VAE), the Workers' Educational Association (WEA) and the Third Age Trust. Interviewees were generally in consensus that adult learning – and in particular adult learning in the creative arts – has a strong positive impact.

The influence of creative adult learning in promoting social inclusion, especially amongst priority groups, was cited as a major benefit in promoting people's development across the country as well as developing individuals' self-confidence, creativity and social esteem. The social value of group participation in arts learning for promoting community cohesion was commonly mentioned by Local Authority representatives, a number of whom provided creative learning through Neighbourhood Learning for Deprived Communities (NLDC) funded provision. Another substantial benefit mentioned was the role of creative learning in bringing multicultural communities together, as some artforms (such as music and dance) were especially suited to promoting open-mindedness and cultural awareness. In addition one respondent in particular stressed the benefits to health and well-being, especially in later life when 'the creative mind' was seen to become notably active.

Participation in creative adult learning opportunities can also assist in educational and professional development. Non-accredited courses are often a useful 'stepping stone' to further formal accredited learning and/or employment within the sector. Interviews with learners reinforced this to some extent, with a number of younger learners stating that an element of motivation to participate was gaining broad experience in the sector for CV enhancement. However, interviewees were keen to stress that informal learning was not only seen as a means to an end – it was also recognised as inherently beneficial.

In providing continued support to the creative adult learning sector to enable these impacts, the supporting organisations felt it was important to ensure continued and (where possible) increased promotion of the opportunities available for members of the public to get involved in adult learning in the creative arts. Suggestions for awareness raising activities include:

- 'Taster' events based in local communities, which would have the potential to spark people's interest in creative arts adult learning.
- Open days, where a number of groups come together under one roof and share promotional responsibilities.

Consultees also felt that a common set of values for adult learning would assist in informing a cohesive adult learning system and the delivery of universal aims. Given the range of funding available to creative adult learning, the creation of a common application gateway through which funding from all streams/organisations concerned could be channelled in order to meet local needs would be welcomed.

10.4 Developing creative adult learning

The aim of this element of the project was to:

- Produce an authoritative base of quantitative and qualitative evidence about the arts in adult learning that can be used to help broaden and deepen levels of engagement in the arts and enable the development of individuals' skills and creativity.

This report has distilled a number of potential areas of development for the sector:

- The reformed LSC streams have altered funding arrangements for many Local Authorities, resulting in a move away from subsidised mainstream public programmes towards participant-financed learning. However, some authorities have developed an innovative approach to planning the delivery of creative adult learning based on the contributions it can make to the community. The observed social value of group participation in creative adult learning courses means that some authorities have begun to offer courses under the Neighbourhood Learning for Deprived Communities stream. This potentially provides an opportunity to combine arts engagement initiatives with learning in deprived communities.

- Accessing courses is a significant issue for a variety of reasons. While cost is an issue, the problem in many cases is less to do with affordability and more to do with investment. The cost of materials and upfront fees to participate in a new artform which the individual might not enjoy means that some are understandably reluctant to try new things. Taster sessions and one-day courses are therefore an ideal introduction to the sector. Currently only 15% of creative courses available are day-long courses and only 10% run for between one day and one week. In addition to this LSC funding has ceased for very short learning aims (those below nine hours) as they are felt to have limited benefits in terms of progression for learners. It is therefore feasible that the number of short courses will decline further.
- The consultation undertaken also provided an indication that some priority groups (such as the elderly) do need additional support with regard to participation in creative arts learning. The obstacles faced often relate to straightforward considerations such as choice, access and costs. However, another consideration voiced by both learners and providers and which is especially relevant to priority groups is the lack of emotional support (i.e. advice and encouragement) available to some learners, which is vital to maximising the potential social benefits of adult learning. The sector would benefit from a stronger focus upon attracting and retaining participants from priority groups by addressing issues such as low confidence and social exclusion.
- There is often a significant emphasis on continued participation in the sector following completion of a course. There is a perceived ideal that people will move on to further accredited study, formal learning or even employment. Many consultees were keen to stress the importance of participation for pleasure and the benefits of individual and personal self-development unrelated to educational or professional progression. Interviews with learners demonstrated a lack of interest in training that was too structured or formal, therefore continuing to develop an arts environment which emphasises and encourages participation in isolation from progression would undoubtedly benefit the sector. However, while the need to develop an arts environment which recognises non-accredited participation as inherently valuable is important, it is also necessary to recognise that the learning experience can often transform people's attitudes towards accredited learning. The capacity of the creative sector to engage people who may then move on to further learning may provide an opportunity to link with the level 2 skills agenda.

News from Voluntary Arts Wales

Spring 2010

Outside The Box

The Arts World seems to be riddled with a series of counterpoints and opposing positions. Is opera high art and rock music low art? Is product more important than process for arts producers and the opposite true for participatory arts activity? Is contemporary art of a higher status than traditional artforms because one is perceived by some to be more innovative than the other? What is more important - the intrinsic or instrumental values of taking part in the arts? And when does an amateur become a professional? This leads to an underpinning issue - where are the boundaries between the professional and amateur parts of the sector?

Really! I propose we do away with all these labels and arguments – in many cases they are unhelpful and only serve to create barriers. We are working in the arts for goodness sake! Do we really have to put things in boxes? For example, when does a writer who has been grafting away producing work in a community writing group for years suddenly become professional? In the event of his/her first published work?

As to the other arguments - Art should not be placed on a scale of low to high; both quality of product and process are important throughout the arts; contemporary and traditional arts have equal status, often intertwine and are not mutually exclusive; all participation in the arts has instrumental and intrinsic value.

The arts sector in Wales is fluid and organic, with many blurring of boundaries and various parts interconnecting in an array of different ways which are mutually supportive. For example, voluntary and community arts activities are not only a breeding ground for the professional arts and creative industries, but actually create employment opportunities that support professional artists.

Finally then, a plea to ensure that grass roots activity is given the same profile as other arts activity. Without these roots there would be no trees.

Wales Promotes and Nurtures its International Talent

The Artist Development Programme for Black and Ethnic Minority Artists has gained momentum and support from a range of partners including its principle funder, the Arts Council of Wales. The two pronged programme comprised of the Artist Database and an Artist Professional Development Programme was launched in 2006.

After discussions with the Arts Council in 2005, the Black Voluntary Sector Network Wales (BVSNW) established the BME Artist Database to promote the arts, artists and cultural diversity. The aim was to showcase to a wider audience the positive impact of multiculturalism on society and how contemporary Wales has been enriched by the influences of multiculturalism.

Since then the programme has blossomed, delivering events, facilitating consultations and supporting artists across Wales in their specified art form; from music to performance arts, from literature to visual arts and from dance to multi-media.

The Arts today provide a viable and rewarding career path for many practitioners. With the variety of academic courses available to artists in Wales through institutions such as the Atrium, the University of Glamorgan's flagship creative and cultural centre, new opportunities are becoming available to practice as skilled professionals in a fiercely competitive market suffering from the affects of the current recession.

BVSNW has always recognised the need for alternative avenues to build skills and the capacity of emerging Black and Ethnic Minority artists. We achieve this through working in collaboration with mainstream service providers as well as a diverse range of Wales-wide partners.

'Our Vision is to see Cultural Arts playing their fullest role in Wales with artists, galleries & spaces, Arts agencies & local authorities, training bodies, funders, employers and promoters achieving regional and national excellence in practice, excellence in diversity and excellence in equality of opportunity.'

Agents of change in the Celtic countries

The Celtic Neighbours project, a three year action research project funded by the Carnegie UK Trust, drew to a close in 2009. It provided community-based arts and cultural groups that work through their indigenous languages with an opportunity to collaborate.

A report in the form of a colourful book entitled 'Beirm, Bwrlwm, Fiudadh Foinn (Ferment): Culture, confidence and regeneration in rural Celtic communities' was launched at the National Eisteddfod in Bala in August by the Minister for Heritage, Alun Ffred Jones AM. The book is in three parts: best practice, agents of change, and what was learnt from the process, and can be viewed on our website www.vaw.org.uk

We would like to thank Meic Llewelyn, Bwrlwm's editor (above, left), for all his hard work and enthusiasm with the Celtic Neighbours project and previously as a member of staff with VAW. Meic's commitment is much appreciated. Thank you Meic.

Who's who in Voluntary Arts Wales

A small but busy team! Voluntary Arts Wales has three members of staff: Jacquy Box, Wales Coordinator; Sioned Best, Finance Officer and Gwenan Davies, Information Officer. Sioned and Gwenan both work part-time from the office in Welshpool, whilst Jacquy, when she's not out and about, works from home in South Wales. Sioned is now on maternity leave, and in her absence, Ingela Mann has been appointed to take over her responsibilities.

Minister plans Statement on Culture

The Minister for Heritage, Alun Ffred Jones AM, plans to issue a short Statement on Culture in 2010. It's expected that the Statement will set out some key short term messages – it will not be a strategy or have an action plan, but its publication may lead to new areas of work. An initial discussion paper was presented to the Arts Strategy Board during the autumn 2009. If you would like to know more, please contact VAW as Jacquy Box represents the voluntary arts sector on the Board.

VAN briefings go bilingual

VAN briefings provide organisations and individuals in the voluntary arts sector with up to date information about a wide range of topics of interest to the sector in the UK. They are a valuable source of expertise, and are available from www.voluntaryarts.org VAN briefings are now available in Welsh as well as English, and can be downloaded from www.vaw.org.uk

Guidance on Vetting and Barring Scheme

The new Vetting and Barring Scheme was launched in October 2009 to protect children and vulnerable adults. The scheme will have a major impact on the recruitment and monitoring practices of people working or volunteering with children. Official guidance can be found on the new Independent Safeguarding Authority (ISA) website www.isa.gov.uk A new VAN briefing, 'Children and Vulnerable Groups', is now available to download from www.voluntaryarts.org

News from Voluntary Arts Wales

Spring 2009

Recession Busting

Isn't it ironic how so many external factors seem to have a detrimental effect on communities and the groups who work in them, whilst so many positive outcomes happen and are possible by virtue of them? At the moment, the external factors paint a pretty grim picture for community based, voluntary arts sector organisations and groups:

- the gloom of the current financial climate and the lack of confidence in the financial system;
- leading to less availability of public funds and a decline in income for voluntary arts sector organisations and groups;
- leading to even more tightly targeted funding streams that cut out many excellent projects and infrastructure organisations;
- leading to more pressure on voluntary boards and trustees in terms of keeping the organisations viable, whilst dealing with restructures, mergers, redundancies and - in the worst instances - closures;
- ultimately leading to less community based projects and initiatives.

Over the last year with diminishing lottery funds, the Olympics drain and now the economic climate, Voluntary Arts Wales has seen a steady growth in the number of small voluntary arts groups and organisations requiring our help. About 90% of the information requests we receive are from people searching for funding. During the last six months a substantial amount of our work has been helping other organisations with matters such as redundancy procedures due to financial crisis.

The results of all the financial implications for the sector and communities at this time coupled together with the increasing restrictions of the legislative drive (see article on licensing but also think childcare and health and safety legislation) really appears disastrous.

This all just at the very time when these community initiatives are even more vital in view of the likely impact on communities of the economic downturn, such as increasing mental health issues, alcohol and drug addiction and homelessness. Voluntary arts groups and organisations need even more support because of this – they are embedded in communities and best placed to help combat the results of this economic climate on individuals and families in their area. Infrastructure bodies to support these groups are also more needed than ever.

The whole of the Third (Voluntary) Sector seems to be galvanising itself to deal with the predicted issues. For example, in England the Office of the Third Sector and the Local Government Association have already committed to an action plan to deal with “Recession and the Third Sector.” The National Council for Voluntary Organisations is proposing to ask the UK Government for £100 million pounds to help deal with the increasing demands organisations in the Third Sector will have to face. Wales Council for Voluntary Action has recently drafted an outline action plan “The Third Sector and the Recession in Wales” and is planning to hold a conference in April.

It is inevitable that there are going to be increased demands for certain services and projects in communities to tackle the problems resulting from the recession. As we know, many of these serious issues relating to an individual’s physical and mental health and wellbeing are improved by the innovative use of Participatory Arts alongside ongoing participation in community embedded cultural activity: the impact of participating in the arts to improve mental health issues is well proven.

Participatory Arts are definitely the way forward! The strength of working together creatively for shared outcomes, the feeling of community cohesion, the joy that comes from participating in cultural activities together, the chance to socialise and the positivity this engenders, the development of new skills and the therapeutic benefits all contribute towards helping to address individual and social problems in the community. With the growing number of people who are going to be unemployed and in need of constructive activity and rebuilding their confidence, these activities are essential.

The voluntary arts sector needs to seize the very essence of community – work together, be resilient to change and flexible to adapt to these challenging circumstances. Here is the impetus for groups to look at different, more sustainable ways of creating activity. This is the time for organisations to take a really good look at themselves, to refocus and hopefully move forward to a healthier place.

The financially governed world we live in has proved its fragility and people have lost an incredible amount of confidence in it, but communities are still thriving and with the right support have an amazing capacity to make the world we live in a better place.

So come on Welsh Assembly, local government, funders and businesses – support our communities - work with us, invest in us, give us the opportunities and the respect we deserve.

Licence to Kill?

Envise the scene: a community dance class for young people who want to learn street dance – a frantic dance practitioner trying to tally up how many times they have played a particular piece of recorded music for the workshops. ‘Now is that 8 times we’ve played the Pussycat Dolls and 12 times Franz Ferdinand, or was it 13?’ When you realise that many community dance organisations put on in excess of 50 workshops a week, with groups of up to 30 members at each workshop, you start to see the scale of this counting game. But this is in effect what could be required if proposed amendments to the licencing law come into being.

The Licensing Act came into force in 2003. During the consultation period, the cultural industries and voluntary arts sector expressed serious concerns about the effects the Act would have on community activity. From here on ensued confusion - what did the Act actually say? What did the Act mean in law? How would the Licensing Officers in Local Authorities interpret it? How would it be applied?

Let’s be honest - confusion still reigns and the interpretation and application of the Act varies widely across local authorities in Wales and England. It doesn’t help that the Welsh Assembly Government does not have direct jurisdiction over this Act: however, the negative effects will impact on culture, education, cultural industries, cultural tourism, economic development and social justice for which it does have a remit. Voluntary Arts Network (VAN) has produced two briefings to try and address some of the confusion surrounding the Act: Licensing Act 2003 (No. 76) and What’s happened to the Licensing Act 2003? (No.101). Both are available to download from the VAN website at www.voluntaryarts.org and claimed to have dealt with the confusion over the status of ‘incidental music’ and other community concerns. There is, in fact, very little clarification or change when comparing the two versions. And then when you thought things couldn’t get any worse, new proposals by the UK Intellectual Property Office (UK-IPO) to end exemptions for charities and other not-for-profit organisations would mean that playing music at events ranging from tea parties to conferences to participatory arts workshops would cost money. Voluntary arts groups are now fearful that they may have to find millions of pounds every year if laws covering the use of recorded music for events and workshops are changed in this way. The consultation on this proposed amendment closed in October 2008: however, we will continue to represent the views of the sector where possible to advocate against its implementation.

This proposal shows a very incomplete knowledge of how the wider community actually works, and expecting small arts groups to have the financial resources to be able to pay for access to music shows a real lack of awareness of the income and expenditure streams of the average local arts group. Coupled with this, the law as it stands appears to be prohibitive of spontaneous music making sessions in pubs and community venues. The more organisations and clubs begin to clamp down on events of this nature, the greater the loss in terms of reduced opportunities to freely participate in music making. We know of specific examples of activity which have not taken place because of this Act. This in itself is a great loss, but when you consider that this kind of participation is often the first rung of the ladder for individuals and groups who then move on to contribute to the creative industries in Wales, and how the whole spectrum of this kind of cultural activity contributes to Wales as a cultural tourism destination, the whole situation is much more worrying.

We cannot think of any empirical evidence that supports the need for these reforms, only evidence indicating this legislation would damage activity in the voluntary sector. We believe this is another case of unnecessary and disproportionate regulation, and we doubt that the copyright owners would see much or any additional income after taking relevant administration costs into account. And how do you actually police this – a Women's Institute group participating in a salsa class in the depths of Ceredigion – now there's a challenge!

The Arts Strategy Board

The Arts Strategy Board was set up in response to the recommendation in the Stephens Report (2006) to establish a forum which would ensure a more joined-up approach to the development of arts policy and strategy in Wales. The Board is a Ministerial advisory group with a remit to challenge, inform and help shape future arts policy and strategies of the Assembly Government. It has no decision making powers and there are no formal voting procedures.

The Board meets quarterly and is chaired by the Minister for Heritage, Alun Ffred Jones AM. The Board members include the Minister and representatives from the Arts Council of Wales, the Welsh Local Government Association, Arts and Business Cymru, Wales Arts International, Voluntary Arts Wales and senior officials from the Welsh Assembly Government's Culture, Welsh Language and Sport Department. Additional members are invited by the Chair on an ad hoc basis to assist in the development of specific strategies.

This is the forum where draft strategies such as those for Arts in Health and Wellbeing and Young People and the Arts, both developed by the Arts Council of Wales, are discussed prior to being signed off. Jacquy Box, Wales Co-ordinator, Voluntary Arts Wales, represents the voluntary arts sector on the Board. Examples of issues we have advocated for on behalf of the sector include the effects of the Olympics funding drain and licensing law changes and health and safety legislation which are both having a negative impact on participatory arts in communities. The agenda is set a considerable time in advance, but should you wish to raise issues of relevance to the voluntary arts sector, please contact us.

'Diwylliant Bro'

Theatr Felinfach is above all a centre for informal education, working primarily through drama in the medium of Welsh, in schools across Ceredigion. They were recently approached by a rural primary school, anxious that Welsh was being displaced as the playground language - a concern felt by many, of course, especially in those areas that have experienced large-scale inward migration in recent decades. Could Theatr Felinfach do anything to reverse this school's situation?

A 'Clwb Drama' was set up, meeting weekly and led by one of the theatre's specialist workers, in which as well as taking part in creative games, children were encouraged to devise and act out stories relating to their own lives and community, and to research the area's history. All activities take place through the medium of Welsh, but learners and non-speakers are welcomed and supported, enabling them to take part, and improve their skills, at a level comfortable to themselves. Children are now playing together more in both languages, the school staff have noted, and they're convinced that the profile of the Welsh language, as well as the cultural confidence of the Welsh-speaking majority, has markedly improved. The project, which is now leading up to an end-of-year public performance, has been so successful that a petition was launched, signed by the children as well as staff and teachers, that Theatr Felinfach would continue working in the school for the next year too.

As news has got around, three other schools across the county have approached the theatre for the same kind of support, and approaches have been received from further afield: the staff at Felinfach are beginning to realise that they may have created a monster – of the nicest possible kind. A model like this may well, of course, be transferrable in future not only to other Welsh and minority-language communities, but in all situations in which different languages and cultures live together side by side.

'Diwylliant Bro' (the culture of the community) has now been set up as a free-standing project under the aegis of the Friends of Theatr Felinfach, a group whose raison-d'être is the development of activities outside the theatre's normal remit. A trained and experienced Development Officer has been appointed, and an integral part of future initiatives will be the training of school teachers, as part of each project, to a level at which they'll be able to take over the activity when the time is right. The Friends are actively seeking funding to further develop a very exciting project – watch this space for further news.

The Third Sector Partnership Council

The Third Sector Partnership Council (previously known as the Voluntary Sector Partnership Council) is a key mechanism for maintaining regular dialogue between the voluntary sector and the Welsh Assembly Government. It is chaired by Dr Brian Gibbons, Minister for Social Justice and Local Government, who has responsibility for the sector. The Partnership Council is made up of twenty four representatives of voluntary sector networks working across twenty four key areas of voluntary sector activity (from animal welfare to social housing) as well as three representatives from Wales Council for Voluntary Action (WCVA). Its main purpose is to make sure that the principles set out in the Assembly's Voluntary Sector Scheme are put into practice. It also provides an opportunity for the sector to raise key issues of interest and concern which affect the voluntary sector in Wales. Examples of issues discussed are the Communities First programme, new ways of funding the sector and procurement. Issues relating to a specific area of interest e.g. voluntary arts can be taken up through twice yearly meetings between the voluntary sector and the relevant Minister. Jacquy Box, Voluntary Arts Wales, represents the arts and heritage sector on the Partnership Council.

The agendas are set a considerable time in advance, but should you wish to raise issues of relevance to the voluntary arts sector, please contact us.

'An excellent day!'

It was an absolutely brilliant day, very helpful' - one of the positive comments we received about our Welsh Language Scheme event. Around thirty participants, mainly from voluntary arts umbrella bodies, heard from experts and practitioners about the importance of Welsh Language Schemes and working bilingually in the voluntary sector. The Minister for Heritage, Alun Ffred Jones AM, told those present that they had a special opportunity to contribute to the task of making the Welsh language an essential part of Welsh identity. The event, held at the end of February at the Senedd, Cardiff Bay, proved to be interesting, practical and informative, and we hope to organise similar events in future.

Voluntary Arts Wales is the development agency for the participatory arts in Wales, existing to promote and support participation in the arts as a force for personal development, community cohesion and fun. 'Join us in our passion for participation.'

Newyddion gan Celfyddydau Gwirfoddol Cymru

Gwanwyn 2009

Goresgyn y Dirwasgiad

Tydi hi'n eironig sut gall gymaint o ffactorau allanol gael effaith niweidiol ar gymunedau a'r grwpiau sy'n gweithio ynddynt, tra bod llawer o bethau cadarnhaol yn digwydd ac yn debygol o ddigwydd o ganlyniad i'w rhinweddau? Ar hyn o bryd, o edrych ar y ffactorau allanol, mae'n edrych yn bur ddu ar fudiadau a grwpiau cymunedol y sector celfyddydau gwirfoddol:

- anobaith yn yr hinsawdd gyllidol bresennol a'r diffyg hyder yn y system gyllido;
- hynny'n arwain at lai o gronfeydd cyllido cyhoeddus a dirywiad mewn incwm i fudiadau a grwpiau'r sector celfyddydau gwirfoddol;
- arwain at dargedu ffrydiau cyllido cyhoeddus tynnach, gan anghofio am nifer o brosiectau gwych a chyrrff is-adeiledd;
- arwain at ragor o bwysau ar fyrddau ac ymddiriedolwyr gwirfoddol wrth geisio cadw mudiadau yn ddichonadwy, ymdrin ag ailstrwythuro, cyfuno, colli swyddi ac - yn yr amgylchiadau gwaethaf - cau llefydd;
- gan arwain yn y pen draw at lai o brosiectau a mentrau cymunedol.

Dros y flwyddyn ddiwethaf, gyda lleihad yng nghyllid y Loteri, y Gemau Olympaidd yn mynd a llawer o gyllid y wlad, a nawr y dirwasgiad economaidd, mae Celfyddydau Gwirfoddol

Cydnabyddiaeth: Maria Hayes, gyda chefnogaeth Prosiect Cymdogion Celtaidd.

CC(3) AWE 09c

Cymru wedi gweld cynnydd yn y nifer o grwpiau a mudiadau bychain celfyddydol gwirfoddol sydd eisiau ein cymorth. Daw oddeutu 90% o'r ymholiadau a dderbyniwn gan bobl sy'n chwilio am gyllid. Dros y chwe mis diwethaf, mae llawer o'n gwaith wedi bod yn cynorthwyo mudiadau eraill ynglŷn â materion fel trefniadau diswyddo oherwydd argyfwng cyllidol.

Mae canlyniadau'r holl oblygiadau ariannol yn y sector a'r gymuned ar hyn o bryd, yn ogystal â'r cyfyngiadau cynyddol yn yr ymgyrch deddfwriaethol (gweler yr erthygl ar drwyddedu ond meddyliwch hefyd am ddeddfwriaeth gofal plant ac iechyd a diogelwch) yn ymddangos yn drychinebus.

Mae hyn i gyd mewn cyfnod lle mae'r holl fentrau cymunedol yma hyd yn oed yn fwy hanfodol wrth edrych ar yr effeithiau ar gymunedau yn ystod y dirywiad economaidd, megis materion iechyd meddwl cynyddol, dibyniaeth ar alcohol a chyffuriau a bod yn ddigartref. Mae grwpiau a mudiadau yn y sector celfyddydol angen mwy o gefnogaeth oherwydd hyn - maent wedi eu sefydlu'n rhan o'r cymunedau, ac yn y lle gorau er mwyn ceisio brwydro yn erbyn effeithiau'r hinsawdd economaidd ar ran unigolion a theuluoedd sy'n eu hardal hwy. Mae angen y cyrff is-adeiledd nawr fwy nag erioed i gefnogi'r grwpiau yma.

Mae'r Trydydd Sector (Gwirfoddol) cyfan i'w weld yn ysgogi ei hun i ymdrin â'r materion a ragwelir. Er enghraifft, yn Lloegr mae Swyddfa'r Trydydd Sector a'r Gymdeithas Llywodraeth Leol wedi ymrwymo'n barod i gynllun gweithredol i ymdrin â 'Dirwasgiad yn y Trydydd Sector'. Mae Cyngor Cenedlaethol Mudiadau Gwirfoddol (NCVO) yn bwriadu gofyn i Lywodraeth San Steffan am £100 miliwn o bunnau i helpu ymdrin â'r galwadau cynyddol sy'n wynebu mudiadau yn y trydydd sector. Yn ddiweddar, mae Cyngor Gweithredu Gwirfoddol Cymru (WCVA) wedi llunio cynllun drafft gweithredol "Y Trydydd Sector a'r Dirwasgiad yng Nghymru", ac yn bwriadu cynnal cynhadledd ym mis Ebrill.

Mae'n anochel y bydd y gofynion yn cynyddu ar gyfer rhai gwasanaethau a phrosiectau i geisio trechu'r problemau mewn cymunedau o ganlyniad i'r dirwasgiad. Fel y gwyddom, caiff nifer o'r materion difrifol yma sy'n berthnasol i iechyd a lles corfforol a meddyliol unigolion eu gwella drwy ddefnydd arloesol o'r Celfyddydau Cyfranogol, ynghyd â chymryd rhan mewn gweithgareddau diwylliannol sy'n digwydd yn y gymuned e.e. profwyd fod cymryd rhan yn y celfyddydau yn gwella achosion iechyd meddwl.

Yn bendant, Celfyddydau Cyfranogol yw'r ffordd ymlaen! Mae'r nerth o weithio gyda'n gilydd yn greadigol tua'r un nod, y teimlad o gydlynyn gymunedol, y llawenydd a ddaw o gymryd rhan mewn gweithgareddau diwylliannol gyda'n gilydd, y cyfle i gymdeithasu a'r effaith gadarnhaol sy'n deillio o hynny, datblygu sgiliau newydd a'u manteision therapiwtig, i gyd yn cyfrannu at gynorthwyo rhywun i fynd i'r afael â phroblemau unigolion a phroblemau cymdeithasol yn y gymuned. Gyda'r nifer o bobl yn ddi-waith yn cynyddu, mae gweithgareddau adeiladol fel hyn yn angenrheidiol ar gyfer magu hyder.

Mae angen i'r celfyddydau gwirfoddol feddiannu hanfodion y gymuned – cydweithio, gwytnwch wrth wynebu newid a bod yn hyblyg mewn amgylchiadau heriol fel hyn. Dyma'r symbyliad i grwpiau edrych ar ffyrdd gwahanol a mwy cynhaliol o greu gweithgaredd. Dyma'r amser i fudiadau gymeryd golwg fanwl arnynt eu hunain ac i ail-ganolbwyntio gyda'r gobaith o symud ymlaen i le gwell.

Mae'r byd ariannol yma rydym yn byw ynddo wedi dangos pa mor fregus y gall fod ac mae pobl wedi colli hyder ynddo. Ond mae cymunedau yn parhau i lewyrchu a chyda'r gefnogaeth gywir mae ganddynt allu rhyfeddol i wneud y byd yma yn le gwell i fyw.

Felly dewch yn eich blaen Lywodraeth y Cynulliad, llywodraeth leol, cyllidwyr a busnesau - cefnogwch ein cymunedau - gweithiwrch gyda ni, buddsoddwch ynom ni, rhowch gyfleoedd i ni a'r parch rydym ni'n ei haeddu.

Trwydded i Ladd?

Dychmygwch yr olygfa: dosbarth dawns gymunedol i bobl ifanc sydd eisiau dysgu dawns y stryd - ymarferydd dawns gorffwyll yn ceisio cadw cyfrif ar y nifer o weithiau maent wedi chwarae yr un darn o gerddoriaeth wedi ei recordio ar gyfer y gweithdai. 'Ai 8 gwaith wnaethon ni chwarae'r Pussycat Dolls a 12 gwaith Franz Ferdinand, neu ai 13 oedd e?' Pan mae rhywun yn sylweddoli fod llawer o fudiadau dawns gymunedol yn cynnal dros 50 o weithdai'r wythnos, gydag oddeutu 30 aelod ymhob gweithdy, yna fe gychwynnwch chi sylweddoli maint y gêm cyfri yma. Ond dyma beth a ddisgwylir os daw'r newidiadau hyn i'r gyfraith drwyddedu i rym.

Daeth y Ddeddf Trwyddedu i rym yn 2003. Yn ystod y cyfnod ymgynghori, mynegodd y diwydiannau diwylliannol a'r sector celfyddydau gwirfoddol eu pryderon ynglŷn ag effeithiau'r Ddeddf yma ar weithgareddau cymunedol. O hyn ymlaen roedd dryswch mawr - beth yn union ddywedai'r Ddeddf? Beth a olygai'r Ddeddf mewn cyfraith? Sut y byddai Swyddogion Trwyddedu mewn Awdurdodau Lleol yn ei dehongli? Sut fyddai'n cael ei weithredu?

I fod yn deg, mae'r dryswch yn parhau gan fod y dehongliad a'r ffordd caiff y Ddeddf ei gweithredu yn amrywio'n eang o un awdurdod lleol i'r llall ar draws Cymru a Lloegr. Mae pethau'n gymhleth am nad oes gan Lywodraeth y Cynulliad awdurdod uniongyrchol dros y Ddeddf: fodd bynnag, bydd yr effeithiau negyddol yn effeithio diwylliant, addysg, diwydiannau diwylliannol, twristiaeth ddiwylliannol, datblygiad economaidd a chyfiawnder cymdeithasol, meysydd lle mae ganddynt gyfrifoldeb drostynt. Er mwyn ceisio datrys y dryswch, mae'r Rhwydwaith Celfyddydau Gwirfoddol (VAN) wedi cyhoeddi dau bapur briffio: 'Licensing Act 2003' (Rhif 76) a 'What's happened to the Licensing Act 2003?' (Rhif 101). Gellir eu llawrlwytho oddi ar wefan VAN ar www.voluntaryarts.org

Ym Mehefin 2007, fe gyhoeddodd yr Adran Cyfryngau Diwylliannol a Chwaraeon Nodiadau Arweiniol Diwygiedig i Swyddogion Trwyddedu mewn Awdurdodau Lleol, gan hawlio eu bod wedi ymdrin â'r dryswch gyda statws 'cerddoriaeth ddamweiniol' a phryderon cymunedol eraill. Ychydig iawn o gadarnhad neu newid sydd yna wrth gymharu'r ddwy fersiwn. A phan roedd rhywun yn meddwl na allai pethau waethygu, byddai cynigion newydd gan Swyddfa Eiddo Deallusol y DU (UK-IPO) i roi terfyn ar eithriadau i elusennau a mudiadau di-elw eraill yn golygu y byddai chwarae cerddoriaeth mewn digwyddiadau yn amrywio o bartion i gynadleddau i weithdai celfyddydol cyfranogol yn costio arian. Bellach, mae grwpiau celfyddydau gwirfoddol yn ofni bydd rhaid iddynt ddarganfod miliynau o bunnau yn flynyddol os caiff cyfreithiau sy'n ymdrin â cherddoriaeth wedi ei recordio ar gyfer digwyddiadau a gweithdai eu newid fel hyn. Daeth yr ymgynghoriad ar y diwygiad arfaethedig i ben fis Hydref 2008. Fodd bynnag, byddwn yn parhau i gynrychioli barn y sector lle bo modd a dadlau yn erbyn ei weithredu.

Mae'r cynnig yma yn dangos gwybodaeth hynod anghyflawn o'r ffordd mae cymuned ehangach yn gweithio mewn gwirionedd, drwy ddisgwyl bod gan grwpiau bychain celfyddydol yr adnoddau ariannol i allu talu am gerddoriaeth. Dangosa hyn ddiffyg ymwybyddiaeth o ffrydiau incwm a gwariant o fewn y grŵp celfyddydol lleol cyffredin. Yn cydfynd â hyn, mae'r gyfraith fel y mae hi nawr yn ymddangos ei bod yn gwahardd sesiynau cyfansoddi digymell mewn tafarndai a lleoliadau cymunedol. Y mwya' mae mudiadau a chlybiau yn dechrau gwahardd digwyddiadau fel hyn, bydd y golled yn enfawr o ran llai o gyfleoedd i fod yn rhydd i allu cymryd rhan mewn cyfansoddi cerddoriaeth. Rydym yn gwybod am enghreifftiau penodol o weithgareddau na chymerodd le oherwydd y Ddeddf hon. Mae hyn yn ei hun yn golled fawr, ond mae'r sefyllfa gyfan yn peri gofid pan fyddwch chi'n ystyried bod y math yma o gymryd rhan yn arwain unigolion a grwpiau i symud ymlaen i gyfrannu i'r diwydiannau creadigol yng Nghymru - mae'r sbectrwem cyfan o weithgaredd diwylliannol o'r math yma yn cyfrannu i Gymru fel lleoliad twristiaeth ddiwylliannol.

Ni allwn feddwl am dystiolaeth empeiraidd sy'n cefnogi'r angen am y diwygiadau yma, dim ond dystiolaeth sy'n dangos gall y ddeddfwriaeth yma niweidio gweithgareddau yn y sector gwirfoddol. Credwn mai achos arall o reolaeth ddiangen ag anghyfartal yw hon, ac rydym yn amau a fydd perchnogion â'u hawlfraint yn gweld ryw lawer neu unrhyw incwm ychwanegol ar ôl ystyried costau gweinyddol. A sut yn union mae rhywun yn fod i blismona hyn - grŵp Sefydliad y Merched yn cymryd rhan mewn dosbarth salsa ym mhellafion Ceredigion - wel dyna i chi sialens!

Cymorth Rhodd

Ydach chi'n gwneud y gorau o unrhyw roddion gaiff eich mudiad neu grŵp? Glywsoch chi am gynllun Cymorth Rhodd? Mae Cymorth Rhodd yn gweithio drwy alluogi elusennau i gymryd rhodd ac yna adhawlio'r dreth ar y 'gros' sy'n cyfateb i'r rhodd ar y gyfradd sylfaenol gan Cyllid a Thollau Ei Mawrhydi (HMRC). Gall fod yn berthnasol i roddion unwaith ac am byth neu i gyfres o roddion rheolaidd. I wybod mwy, ewch i www.hmrc.gov.uk neu www.wcva.org.uk

Bwrdd Strategaeth y Celfyddydau

Ymateb i argymhelliad yn Adroddiad Stephens (2006) oedd y rheswm dros sefydlu Bwrdd Strategaeth y Celfyddydau, fel bod fforwm i sicrhau agwedd mwy cyfunedig tuag at ddatblygu polisïau a strategaethau'r celfyddydau yng Nghymru. Mae'r Bwrdd yn grŵp ymgynghori Gweinidogaethol sydd â chyfrifoldeb i herio, hysbysu ac i gynorthwyo gyda llunio polisïau a strategaethau celfyddydol y Cynulliad ar gyfer y dyfodol. Does gan y Bwrdd ddim pŵer i wneud penderfyniadau a does dim trefniadau pleidleisio ffurfiol.

Mae'r Bwrdd yn cyfarfod bob tri mis, ac yn cael ei gadeirio gan y Gweinidog dros Dreftadaeth, Alun Ffred Jones AC. Mae aelodau'r Bwrdd yn cynnwys y Gweinidog a chynrychiolwyr o Gyngor Celfyddydau Cymru, Cymdeithas Llywodraeth Leol Cymru, Celfyddydau a Busnes Cymru, Celfyddydau Rhyngwladol Cymru, Celfyddydau Gwirfoddol Cymru ac uwch swyddogion o Adran Diwylliant, yr Iaith Gymraeg a Chwaraeon Llywodraeth y Cynulliad. Bydd y Cadeirydd yn gwahodd aelodau ychwanegol yn unswydd i gynorthwyo gyda datblygiad rhai strategaethau penodol.

Dyma'r fforwm lle trafodir strategaethau drafft cyn eu terfynu, fel y rhai hynny ar gyfer Celfyddydau mewn lechyd a Lles a Phobl Ifanc a'r Celfyddydau, y ddau wedi eu datblygu gan Gyngor Celfyddydau Cymru. Jacquy Box, Cydlynnydd Cymru, Celfyddydau Gwirfoddol Cymru, sy'n cynrychioli'r sector celfyddydau gwirfoddol ar y Bwrdd. Mae enghreifftiau o faterion rydym wedi eu trafod ar ran y sector yn cynnwys yr effaith ar gyllid o ganlyniad i'r gemau Olympaidd, a newidiadau mewn cyfraith trwyddedu a deddfwriaeth iechyd a diogelwch sy'n cael effaith niweidiol ar gelfyddydau cyfranogol mewn cymunedau. Caiff pob agenda ei llunio ymhell o flaen llaw, ond os hoffech godi mater sy'n berthnasol i'r sector gyfan yn y cyfarfod yma yna cysylltwch â ni.

Diwylliant Bro

Uwchben popeth, canolfan addysg anffurfiol yw Theatr Felinfach sy'n gweithio'n bennaf trwy ddrama yn y Gymraeg mewn ysgolion ar draws Ceredigion. Yn ddiweddar, fe wnaeth ysgol gynradd wledig grybwyll eu bod yn bryderus ynglŷn â'r ffaith fod y Gymraeg yn cael ei disodli fel iaith y maes chwarae – pryder a deimlai llawer, yn enwedig yn yr ardaloedd hynny sydd wedi eu heffeithio gan fewnfudo ar raddfa uchel yn y degawdau diwethaf. Allai Theatr Felinfach wneud unrhyw beth i wella sefyllfa'r ysgol yma?

Sefydlwyd 'Clwb Drama' a oedd yn cyfarfod yn wythnosol gydag un o weithwyr arbenigol y theatr yn arwain y clwb. Yn ogystal â chymryd rhan mewn gemau creadigol, anogwyd y plant i gynllunio ac actio storïau oedd yn berthnasol i'w bywydau a'u cymuned, ac i ymchwilio hanes yr ardal. Cynhelir yr holl weithgareddau trwy gyfrwng y Gymraeg, ond mae croeso a chefnogaeth hefyd i ddysgwyr a siaradwyr di-Gymraeg er mwyn eu galluogi i gymryd rhan a gwella eu sgiliau mewn amgylchedd y maent yn gyfforddus ynddo. Mae staff yr ysgol wedi sylwi bod y plant yn chwarae gyda'i gilydd fwy yn y ddwy iaith, ac maent yn bendant yn teimlo bod proffil yr iaith Gymraeg yn ogystal â hyder diwylliannol y mwyafrif o siaradwyr Cymraeg wedi gwella'n arw. Mae'r prosiect sydd nawr yn arwain at y perfformiad cyhoeddus ar ddiwedd y flwyddyn wedi bod yn hynod lwyddiannus, ac o ganlyniad i'r llwyddiant yma fe lanswyd deiseb wedi ei harwyddo gan blant, staff ac athrawon er mwyn sicrhau y bydd Theatr Felinfach yn parhau i weithio yn yr ysgol flwyddyn nesaf hefyd.

Fel mae'r newyddion wedi lledaenu, mae tair ysgol arall yn y sir wedi gofyn i'r theatr am yr un fath o gefnogaeth, yn ogystal ag ymholiadau o bell hefyd: mae staff yn Felinfach yn dechrau sylweddoli efallai eu bod wedi creu anghenfil – ond un o'r math mwya' dymunol. Heb os, gellir defnyddio model fel hyn nid yn unig mewn cymunedau Cymraeg a chymunedau eraill gydag ieithoedd lleiafrifol ar gyfer y dyfodol, ond hefyd mewn sefyllfaoedd lle mae ieithoedd a diwylliannau gwahanol yn byw ochr yn ochr â'i gilydd.

Bellach, mae Diwylliant Bro wedi'i sefydlu fel prosiect sy'n sefyll ar ei ben ei hun o dan nawdd Cyfeillion Theatr Felinfach. Diben Cyfeillion Theatr Felin Fach yw datblygu gweithgareddau ar wahân i orchwylion arferol y theatr. Mae Swyddog Datblygu hyfforddedig a phrofiadol wedi ei benodi, a rhan anhepgor o fentrau'r dyfodol fydd hyfforddi athrawon ysgol, fel rhan o bob prosiect, at lefel lle bydd modd iddynt gymryd cyfrifoldeb am y gweithgaredd pan fydd yr amser yn iawn. Mae'r Cyfeillion wrthi'n chwilio am ragor o gyllid i ddatblygu'r prosiect cyffrous yma – cadw'ch lygad am ragor o newyddion.

Cydnabyddiaeth: Theatr Felinfach.

'Diwrnod ardderchog!'

Gwych i ddechrau trafodaeth' – un o'r sylwadau cadarnhaol dderbyniwyd am ein diwrnod Cynlluniau Iaith Gymraeg. Daeth tua tri deg o bobl ynghyd, yn bennaf o gyrff ymbarel celfyddydau gwirfoddol, i glywed gan arbenigwyr ac ymarferyddion am bwysigrwydd Cynlluniau Iaith Gymraeg a gweithio'n ddwyieithog yn y sector gwirfoddol. Dywedodd y Gweinidog dros Dreftadaeth, Alun Ffred Jones AC, wrth y rhai oedd yn bresennol fod ganddynt ran arbennig i'w chwarae fel bod yr iaith Gymraeg yn dod yn rhan hanfodol o hunaniaeth Gymreig. 'Roedd y diwrnod, gynhaliwyd yn y Senedd ddiwedd Chwefror 2009, yn ddiddorol, ymarferol a llawn gwybodaeth. 'Rydym yn gobeithio trefnu digwyddiadau tebyg yn y dyfodol.

'Ymunwch â ni yn ein brwdfrydedd am gymryd rhan.'
